

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SPEAKER.—With the permission of the House, I wish to state that there appear on to-day's Order Paper two notices of motion—one by Mr. Stout, "That the position assumed by His Excellency the Governor in the latter part of his memorandum of the 27th October, 1877, in reference to the appointment of Mr. J. N. Wilson to the Legislative Council, is not in accordance with the privileges of Parliament;" and one by Mr. Gisborne, "That a respectful address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, expressing the regret of the House of Representatives that His Excellency, in his memorandum of the 27th October, 1877, to the Premier, should have taken notice of a matter in agitation and debate in this House. That this House considers that it possesses the ancient and undoubted right and privilege of the House of Commons—namely, that the Crown ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate in that House." I may say that these are not, strictly speaking, regular, as no notice was given of them; but, this being a question of privilege, the House adjourned yesterday in order to take the matter into consideration. I have stated so much to the House on the position of the question, and the opinion of honorable members will bear me out, that I think I should be best acting in conformity with what I gather to be the spirit and intention of the House not to put the question formally, but to wait and see whether any action or proposal has arisen out of the deliberation of honorable members on this question.

Mr. TRAVERS.—When the House adjourned yesterday it was at my suggestion, with the view of considering what steps might be taken in the meantime, in order that the question raised by the honorable member for Dunedin City might be discussed in a manner consistent with the dignity of this House, and as free as possible from all party feeling or party spirit. And with a view, Sir, of enabling the matter to come before this House in such a way—with a view of enabling this House to take the subject into consideration in the most impartial manner—it has been suggested that a Select Committee of the House, presided over by yourself, should be appointed search for precedents, and to report on the subject so raised. I therefore move, as a necessary amendment to the motion of the honorable member for Dunedin City—

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The motion is not before the House.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I move, as a substantive resolution, That a Select Committee be appointed to search for precedents and to report to this House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, to consist of the following members—namely, Mr. Speaker, Messrs.

Stafford, Stout, Rolleston, Gisborne, Reader Wood, Moorhouse, Rees, Harper, Johnston, Montgomery, O'Rorke, Wakefield, Ballance, and the mover, with power to call for persons and papers; to report on Monday next; nine to be a quorum; and to sit to-morrow, if necessary. I presume, Sir, that in considering this motion it will not be necessary to refer in any degree to the matter that is likely to be discussed, and that the House will, should it see its way clear, adopt the suggestion I make, and agree to this resolution without entering into any discussion whatever at present on the main question involved in the motion of the honorable member for Dunedin City. With these observations only, I would move the motion which I have already read to the House. I may be permitted, however, to state that the selection of members of the Committee has been made in such a manner as to indicate, on the face of it, the absence of any intention to treat this question as at all a party question. It has been felt by those who have been acting with myself in this matter that it is desirable, in a question such as that which is now raised between the House and His Excellency the Governor, that it should be treated as dispassionately as any judicial proceeding would be treated by an ordinary tribunal. We are not concerned in dealing with this question from any other point of view than that of adjusting and placing on a proper footing the relations which should subsist between His Excellency the Governor and this branch of the Legislature, and I feel assured that, in approaching the consideration of the question, whether by the Committee, or by this House after hearing the report of the Committee, it will be done in a perfectly calm and dispassionate manner. I feel assured, moreover, that the gentlemen who compose that Committee will be able to offer to this House valuable suggestions and information in connection with the question itself.

Mr. SPEAKER.—In putting this question, I would point out that, although it is unusual and contrary to the practice to have the names of a Select Committee proposed and put to the vote on the same day, still, this being a question of privilege, and there being precedents for such a proceeding, I think I shall be right in putting the question.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I do not rise to oppose the proposition of the honorable member for Wellington City, but I think it will be necessary to put it whether it is the pleasure of the House that this motion should be carried without notice. It might be a very bad precedent for the future if Select Committees, especially of privilege, should be appointed without notice being given. I trust you will put it, Sir, whether it is the desire of the House that such a motion should be made without notice.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There are many precedents for such a proceeding, and I intended to convey that such was the case by drawing the attention of the House to the fact that it was not according to usual practice to name a Committee on the same day as the motion was made. In this case, however, a question of privilege is involved, and there are many precedents where, in such cases, a similar proceeding is followed.

Mr. STOUT.—I do not object to the appointment of the Committee, but I should not like it to be thought that there is any doubt on the part of the House that its privileges have been invaded. I am only afraid that the resolution would assume that aspect if the House should pass the motion in its present form. I think something might be put into the resolution to the effect that this House considers that a breach of its privileges has been committed. The reason why a search for precedents is made is simply to obtain information as to the course which the House should pursue if its privileges have been invaded. If they have not been invaded there is no use in a search for precedents. I only state that now, in order that it may not be considered that a breach of the privileges of the House has not been committed.

Mr. J. C. BROWN.—I understand that this is simply a Committee of inquiry, and when the report is brought up it will be competent for the House to take any action it may think fit. It would be better not to put in such words as the honorable member suggests, as it might only lead to an unseemly conflict.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I rise to move, That the Standing Order which provides that notice be given for the appointment of a Select Committee be suspended, in order that we may not deviate from the regular course of procedure. There is no doubt there may be precedents for the course which is now proposed; but I say it is a very dangerous principle to admit that a Select Committee, especially on privilege, may be appointed without notice unless by the full concurrence of the House. I do not say this in any spirit of opposition to the motion; and it is a very simple matter to suspend the Standing Order, as there are sufficient members present, so that our proceeding may be perfectly regular.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think it right to state to the House that in my opinion such a proceeding is unnecessary when a question of privilege is before the House. Questions of privilege are, from their very nature, urgent, and, as they take precedence of all other business, they also override all those rules which refer to ordinary business, inasmuch as the major includes the minor. If the House thinks it necessary to move the suspension of the Standing Orders, I will proceed to put the question; but I do not think it is necessary. I await the decision of the House.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER put the resolution.

Mr. J. C. BROWN.—I should like to ask whether, on this Committee being appointed, it should not sit at once.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is premature to answer that question.

Sir G. GREY.—I would venture to put the question in another form. What will be the effect, on the proceedings of the House, of the Speaker being on that Committee? Will the House continue to sit in the absence of the Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is evident that the Speaker cannot be in two places at once; but of course the House will have to decide what action it will take in regard to this matter.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at a quarter-past three o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 5th November, 1877.

Mr. Speaker—Privilege—Want of Confidence.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

MR. SPEAKER.

On the motion of Sir G. GREY, it was resolved, That in consequence of the state of Mr. Speaker's health, he be authorized, during the remainder of the session, to call upon the Chairman of Committees to occupy the chair at such times as he may require him to do so, without question being put.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TRAVERS brought up the report of the Select Committee on Privileges of the House, which was read as follows:—

"The Select Committee appointed to search for precedents and to report to this House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, have the honor to report as follows:—

"1. Your Committee, in obedience to the urgency imposed on them by the House, met immediately after the adjournment of the House on Friday last, and have since then given their undivided attention to the subject remitted to them. Ample discussions have taken place, and a careful research after precedents has been instituted.

"2. Your Committee find that the precedents examined and the records of Parliament and writers on constitutional history passim establish or recognize the principle that any notice by the Crown of any matter in agitation or debate in Parliament, but by the information or agreement of Parliament, is an infringement of the privileges of Parliament.

"3. They apply this principle to the memorandum of His Excellency the Governor of the 27th October ultimo, as laid on the table of the House of Representatives by command of His Excellency, upon advice of Ministers, in which, in effect, His Excellency declines to take the advice of his Ministers, upon a question to which he otherwise raises no objection, on the distinct ground that a vote of want of confidence in his Ministers is pending. The exact words of the memorandum of His Excellency the Governor are as follow:—

"Wellington, 27th October, 1877.

"The Governor presents his compliments to Sir George Grey, and, in reply to his memorandum on the subject of the appointment of Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council, the Governor regrets that, after the opinion expressed by him yesterday to Sir George Grey, the Government should have considered it necessary to press this appointment upon him; and he can only repeat, in a more formal manner, what he said yesterday. If Sir George Grey informs the Governor that he requires this appointment for the purpose of enabling Mr. Wilson to take office in the Government, he will make it at once. If, however, it is, as Sir George Grey informed him yesterday, simply for the purpose of adding to the Legislative Council another gentleman belonging to the legal profession, there can be no pressing urgency for the appointment; and the Governor is of opinion that it would be undesirable to make it at a time when a vote of want of confidence is pending.

"If the Government are supported by a majority of the House, the Governor will be happy to accept their advice, and appoint Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council; but, pending the decision of the Assembly, the Governor must decline to make the appointment. "NORMANBY."

"4. Under this view, your Committee have been unable to come to any other conclusion than the following:—

"That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as the reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House.

"5. Your Committee report herewith the minutes of their proceedings.

"WILLIAM FITZHERBERT,

"Chairman.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I beg to move, That this House concurs in the report of the Select Committee on the Privileges of the House, and that a respectful address be presented by this House to His Excellency the Governor covering the resolution of this House. As may be seen from the minutes of proceedings, I was not present when the report of the Committee was adopted; but I have no hesitation in saying that, had I been present, I should have voted for the adoption of the report. I may at once state—that which will be accepted by the House generally, that which was assumed throughout by the members of the Committee—that, if this does, in the opinion of the House, amount to a breach of the privileges of this House, it was, on the part of His Excellency, an inadvertent breach. No member of the Committee for one moment suggested, nor, I trust, will this House for one moment assume, that the action of His Excellency, if it should be deemed to have been a breach of the privileges of the House, was intended to be so. But the Committee were of opinion that a breach of the privileges of the House had been committed, and I think it my duty to endeavour to satisfy this House that it would be justified in accepting the report of the Committee, not as assuming that His Excellency was guilty of a wilful breach of the privileges of this House, but as evincing a determination on the part of this House to vindicate its privileges. In order that the matter may be understood, I will very briefly advert to the facts of the case. The Government were desirous of introducing into the Legislative Council a Mr. Wilson, a gentleman whose character and position we have no right to discuss. We may assume that, when Ministers recommended the appointment of a gentleman to a seat in the Legislative Council, they would not take upon themselves the responsibility of making that recommendation if they supposed that the public interests of the colony would in any degree suffer by its adoption. But we are not called upon to discuss the position or the character of Mr. Wilson; nor do I think it would be wise that this House should discuss the question of the constitutional relations existing between the Governor and his Ministry. We are, as I apprehend, dealing in a purely judicial spirit with a question affecting the privileges of this House, and we have to consider whether or not a breach of its privileges has taken place. As I have already said, the Government moved His Excellency to appoint Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council. His Excellency declined to accept that recommendation, coupling his refusal with reasons which, I think, amount to a breach of the privileges of this House. Something may be said in regard to the publication of those reasons, and to the fact that those reasons were given by His Excellency to his Advisers in connection with the confidential relations which existed between them and himself. But, nevertheless, it appears to me that the very use of those reasons, although strictly confidential, would have amounted to a breach of the privileges of this House. It is a question whether this House could have taken those reasons into its consideration, unless they had been laid on the table of this House; but, His Excellency having concurred in placing the correspondence on the table, including the reasons for refusing to give his assent to their request, he must be held, on his own authority, to have placed before the House the reasons which actuated him in refusing to accept the recommendation of the Government. The House is, therefore, by the act of His Excellency himself, in possession of those reasons; and, being in possession of them, the House is perfectly justified in considering, irrespective of all questions of confidential relations between himself and his Government, whether those reasons do or do not constitute a breach of the privileges of this House. No precedent was discovered by the Committee which went directly to the question at issue; but, as the report of the Committee observes, all the precedents they were able to discover, from the earliest days in which the Parliament of Great Britain has asserted its privileges, concur in establishing the principle adopted by the Committee—the principle that the Governor of this colony is not, for purposes of his own executive action, to take notice of any matter pending in either House of Parliament before that matter is brought under his notice through the ordinary and proper official channel. In dealing with the question submitted to him by his Ministers, he took notice of a debate in this House, upon the result of which would depend the fate of his Ministry. The action of His Excellency in adducing those reasons for refusing to accede to the request of his Ministers was, inadvertently no doubt, bringing the weight of his own opinion in regard to the Ministry to bear upon the consideration of the question before this House. This House would have been justified in accepting those reasons as indicative of a want of confidence on the part of His Excellency in his Ministry, and we must not forget that, when a gentleman occupying his high position does in any degree indicate that state of feeling towards his Ministers in so formal a manner as he has done in his memorandum, he is, to a certain extent, bringing the pressure of his opinion to bear on this House. These are the grounds on which a majority of the Committee has resolved that in this case His Excellency has, in a manner contrary to the privileges of this House, taken notice of matter in debate, and based his own executive action upon the existence of that matter in debate. It is for these reasons that the Committee, in applying the principle which they deduced from the various precedents before them, arrived at the conclusion that His Excellency's action amounted to a breach of the privileges of this House. The question of publication might, as I have already said, be a material question. It might open up two distinct views. It is well known that the relations of Ministers to the Governor are of a strictly confidential nature. Ministers, without the consent of the Governor, cannot disclose that which takes place between them in Cabinet, and the Governor is equally bound to keep secret all that occurs in Cabinet. In fact, the consent of both parties is necessary to the publication of anything that takes place in Cabinet. Therefore, before Ministers could have informed the House of the reasons which actuated His Excellency in declining to accede to their request, they were bound to get the consent of His Excellency to do so. When that has been done, then we have the mutual action of both parties—each has concurred; and, the publication having taken place, both parties are bound to accept the full responsibility that attaches to such publication. If the Governor had refused his assent to the publication, then this House might not have been in a position to take cognizance of the matter. But assuming that Ministers, acting in that constitutional manner which was open to them, had, upon the Governor's refusal to accept their advice, tendered their resignations to His Excellency on the ground that they no longer enjoyed his confidence, it would then have been necessary for Ministers to have justified that course to this House: in fact, the House would have been entitled to press Ministers to disclose the reasons which had actuated them in taking that step. If they said that, in taking such a course, they had felt compelled to take it in consequence of the Governor having refused to take their advice, the responsibility for the next step would have rested with the House. The second position is not the one before us, but nevertheless it is a position in which Ministers may be placed, and it would be one of a very embarrassing character. It is one which satisfies me that it is at the moment when the executive action of the Governor is based upon what may be treated as a breach of the privileges of this House that the offence against this House is committed. It is not committed by publication. It is committed when the Governor takes notice of that which is passing in the House, and which has not come under his cognizance in the proper official manner. Therefore I conceive that the publication of the matter has nothing to do with it, except in investing this House with a full knowledge of the reasons which actuated His Excellency in declining to accept the advice of his Executive. His Excellency's act does not become a wrong simply because the House has become cognizant of it. It is for these reasons that I concur in the report of the Committee, and it is for these reasons that I ask the House to concur in that report. I think it becomes us, in a matter of this kind, to take the earliest possible notice of any attempt, however inadvertent, on the part of the Governor of the colony to infringe the privileges of this House; but I feel, while moving that this is a breach of privilege, that it is due to His Excellency to say that in our opinion it was done inadvertently and unintentionally. I think it should be stated in the address to His Excellency that this House, while feeling it to be its duty to bring under his notice the fact that a breach of its privileges has been committed, also feels itself bound to say that His Excellency had erred inadvertently and unintentionally. I beg to move the motion to which I have referred.

Question put, "That the motion be agreed to;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The motion was consequently agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER vacated the chair, and the CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES took it.

Subsequently the following message was received from His Excellency the Governor:—

"The Governor acknowledges the receipt of an address from the House of Representatives, announcing the concurrence of the House in the report of a Select Committee appointed to search for precedents and to report to the House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, 'That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as a reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House.'

"The Governor begs to inform the House that he has forwarded the same to his constitutional Advisers, and that, as soon as he has received the advice of his Ministers, he will forward his reply to the House of Representatives."

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

The adjourned debate was resumed on the question, 'That this House has no confidence in the Government; and the amendment, That, as the Government have not yet declared their policy, this House declines in the meantime to entertain the question of "confidence" or "no confidence" in the Ministry.'

Mr. HAMLIN.—It will be in your recollection, Sir, and that of most honorable members, that a few evenings ago I asked the House to adjourn, because I thought it would be an act of kindness on our part to Mr. Speaker, who was suffering from a severe cold and indisposition. Certain honorable members at that time appeared to differ from me, but they will now, I hope, feel assured of the fact that I was acting from the best of motives towards the honorable gentleman who so lately presided over us, seeing that to-day he has had to ask you to take the chair in order to relieve him from his duties, as he is too ill to remain. I felt that an adjournment was also necessary in order to allow two members of the Ministry, who were then indisposed, to recover their health, so as to be able to appear and take part in this debate. Unfortunately, our hopes in that direction have not been altogether realized, and, although those honorable gentlemen are in a fair way of recovery, they are not able yet to take their places in this chamber. The honorable member who brought the motion of want of confidence, in speaking in support of it, stated that, if the honorable gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches were to look into the Public Account and make a fair statement to the House, he, for one, would give them his hearty support. That statement appeared to me to be an extraordinary one, for the Ministry had scarcely taken their seats when the honorable member brought forward this motion, before they had had anything like fair time to look into the accounts. It struck me that it was a kind of red-herring which the honorable gentleman was drawing across the scent in order to disturb the minds of honorable members and to delay the business of the country. Had he waited till the Colonial Treasurer had brought down his Financial Statement, and had he then been in a position to prove that the statements of that honorable gentleman were incorrect, or that the policy shadowed forth would be detrimental to the interests of the country, I should perhaps be found voting for the honorable member; but throughout his whole speech nothing was left upon my mind but the impression that he was in a hurry to regain his seat on the Treasury benches without allowing the accounts to be looked into, and without allowing the public to know our proper position. In the course of his remarks also he accused the Premier of being an autocrat. I have had the pleasure of knowing the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government for many years, and I certainly have never known him to be guilty of conduct that would deserve such a term. But what did we see on the part of the honorable member for Egmont? During the last recess officers were dismissed without a moment's warning, without even the cause of their dismissal being explained to them. That, to my mind, was rather an autocratic proceeding. I do not believe that, if the whole colony were searched, we should find another gentleman more despotic in his ideas, and more autocratic, than the honorable member for Egmont; and, when he tried to make the House believe that the Premier was an autocrat, I think he was making a mistake, and that really he wished the House to understand that he himself was the autocrat. The honorable member further went on to say that the present Premier never had a majority in the House. Let us for one moment glance at the positions of the two honorable gentlemen. One has certainly a very strong following in this House, whilst the other, personally, has none. The honorable member for Egmont has no party in this House to follow him or to esteem him either for his ability or for anything he has done for the good government and welfare of the colony. Although he has for years been in the Government, he has never shown us that great ability which he would fain have us believe he possesses. Other speakers who followed, and notably the honorable member for Waikato, endeavoured to make honorable members believe that it was owing to the House being in an excited state of mind that the Native Lands Bill was dropped. I do not believe that any statement whatever could have fallen more flatly upon the ears of honorable members than did that assertion. We are all perfectly well aware that had that measure been passed the peace of the colony would have been endangered. An honorable gentleman near me says "No." I repeat that had that measure been passed the peace of the colony would have been endangered; and, in fact, I believe I am justified in saying that war would have been inevitable. I do not say this without having a large knowledge of the Natives, perhaps quite as large as that possessed by most members of this House; and thus it is that I speak somewhat positively on the matter. The honorable member for Napier (Mr. Sutton), in addressing the House the other evening, told us that the telegrams received from Manuhiri and others had not been correctly interpreted. I had the honor of seeing those telegrams when they were received; I saw the interpretation; and I can tell that honorable gentleman that they are perfectly and straightforwardly interpreted. There was nothing added to nor anything taken from them, but the wishes of those who sent the telegrams were merely put into English. Upon this I can speak more positively than the honorable gentleman, inasmuch as I have a very great knowledge indeed of the Maori language—certainly a much greater knowledge than the honorable member for Napier. The honorable gentleman's colleague, in addressing the House, took exception to the remarks of the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District. I shall go more into that subject when speaking as to what I think those telegrams clearly point to, and as to the good that may be gained generally by the colony retaining the present Government in office; but before proceeding to that I should like to refer to one or two remarks which fell from the honorable member for Nelson City. That honorable gentleman, in excusing his conduct, said that the Government had already foreshadowed its policy. He was shortly afterwards followed by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Fox), who, on the other hand, was positive that the Government had not shown their policy. It was amusing to listen to the contradictions which seemed to exist in the minds of those gentlemen, who both stated that they intended to support the motion of the honorable member for Egmont. We have one honorable gentleman, with a long political career, a man who has served the people of New Zealand in Parliament for many years, stating most positively that no policy has been shadowed forth; whilst we have another honorable gentleman, who has also occupied high positions in the colony, stating that it had been declared. Now, were we not all men possessed of minds of our own, who can discern the views, wishes, and intentions of people, we might be misled by the remarks of gentlemen who occupy high positions, and who have been before the public for a great length of time. I am one of those who believe that, had proper time been given, the Government would have brought down a policy which would have been acceptable to a large majority of this House; and a motion of want of confidence being brought down in such a hurried manner simply goes to prove, in my mind, that honorable gentlemen were afraid that such a policy would be propounded as would deprive them of the opportunity of ever again sitting on those benches. That is, to my mind, a patent fact.

Major ATKINSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I am very glad to have been able to get a "Hear, hear," from the honorable member for Egmont. I trust it is given from the bottom of his heart, and not from his lips alone; for it is quite apparent that he was actuated by sordid and mercenary motives in bringing down his motion.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to call your attention to those words, Sir.

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—It is not Parliamentary to impute such motives, and I hope the honorable gentleman will not repeat them.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I bow to your ruling, Sir. I would be very sorry to use words which are not Parliamentary. Of course I recall them, although I cannot help saying that that was the impression left on my mind. We certainly should have greater reasons for the adoption of the motion than those given by the honorable gentleman when he moved it. The honorable member for Wanganui tried to make a point by attempting to show that an immense saving had been made by the abolition of provincial institutions; but the honorable gentleman, having been absent from the colony for some time, was evidently not aware, or had forgotten, that during his absence the county system was established; and he omitted to take into consideration the expenditure incurred in bringing that system into operation and working it generally. Had the honorable gentleman taken this into account, he would have failed to show that any saving had been effected, but, on the contrary, would have been obliged to admit that larger expenditure had to be incurred. I was a consistent opponent of the Government last year, and I opposed them because I did not think they were carrying out the Public Works scheme in a systematic manner, or in a way beneficial to the well-being and general good of the colony. Many reasons were urged upon the late Government for pushing on certain works. They neglected those works, and consequently the colony has been a great loser. Now, I think that to allow such a state of things to exist would simply be equivalent to admitting that there are only seven gentlemen in New Zealand capable of governing it. There are those who think differently, and I trust that the honorable gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches will have fair-play, and that time will be allowed them to shadow forth their policy and to carry it out. I said just now that I should have to allude to the remarks which fell from the honorable member for Napier (Captain Russell) with reference to the observations of the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District. The honorable member for Napier accused that honorable gentleman of threatening this House with a war upon every possible occasion. I have listened to most of the speeches which that honorable gentleman has delivered to this House. He has not, of his own personal will, threatened the House with a war, but has simply said that, from his knowledge of the mind of the Natives, he believes that under certain circumstances a war would in all probability break out. Surely that is not threatening the House with a war. It is the duty of every member who knows the state of feeling existing in any particular part of the country to come here and explain the views of those whom he may represent. That is all the honorable member for the Eastern Maori District did. I myself have been for months somewhat uneasy as to the intentions of the Natives. Some people have ridiculed the idea of the present concentration of the Natives in what is termed "the King country." They have tried to make the public believe that the object of the Natives in this concentration of their people is simply to cultivate the land and sell the produce to the Europeans. Were that really the fact no one would be more delighted than myself. But I think the late Government must have been told that certain people in the King country had stated that they were concentrating their people for no other purpose than to attempt to regain the Waikato. Thus it was that the settlers in that district felt uneasy at the conduct of the late Ministry in withdrawing the Constabulary from a very important post in the Waikato. A question was asked by the honorable member for Waipa on the subject, but the idea was pooh-poohed, and an opinion expressed that the Natives were collecting simply for the purpose of growing grain, and other peaceful purposes. Some months ago one of the King's executive came into my district, and he did not for one moment hide the intention of the Natives. He told us that he had come to take away the best and the ablest young men he could find in the district, for the purpose of having them ready for retaking the Waikato. That, I believe, must have been reported to the Government. If not, some of their Native officers have been very neglectful of their duty, inasmuch as it was known throughout the length and breadth of the district. I saw Ahipene Kaihau take away fifty or sixty as fine men as it has ever been the pleasure of any man to look at. Now, above all things, we should endeavour to guard against another Native war. What does it mean? We may talk about borrowing a million or two for public works, but if another war breaks out we shall have to borrow eight or ten millions in order to bring those who are in rebellion into subjection, and to afford compensation to thousands of ruined families. I would ask the House to pause before it forces the Native people to commit a breach of the peace, because I hold that the present Native Minister and the Premier, more than any other two gentlemen in New Zealand, are better able to deal with the Natives, and better able to avert another Native war. I firmly believe the telegrams which state that, if those gentlemen are allowed to keep their present seats, we shall be permitted to open up the country between our present boundary at the Waikato and the southern provinces. Nothing could be more beneficial to our welfare as a people, and nothing could be better for both races. It would most effectually put an end to any dread of a Native outbreak for the future. I also regret that the late Government, while it was in power and had the command of plenty of money, should have neglected to open up a large tract of country to the north of Auckland. The honorable member for Newton, when addressing himself to this question, pointed out how the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe) had long sighed to see a number of people who had made money on the Thames Gold Field having an opportunity of settling on the land. If the Government had not got land I could excuse them for neglecting to settle those people, but they had in their hands no less than 450,000 acres of land to the north of Auckland. They had several large blocks of the very best of land—land upon which a large population ought to be settled, and which must necessarily assist us in carrying out the colonization of this country. Now, those people have been driven from the Island through the neglect of the late Ministry. The Ministry have allowed those men to leave our shores without giving them an opportunity of beautifying the wilderness. They have locked up those lands, although for what purpose I cannot say. I think they have done so through negligence. I shall not now continue my remarks in that direction. These are the reasons which will induce me on the present occasion to vote against the motion of the honorable member for Egmont. I believe those gentlemen on the Treasury benches will avert a Native outbreak, and will be the means of opening up the country between our present boundary at the Waikato and the southern provinces. Therefore I ask honorable members to calmly consider their votes on this occasion, for if they bring war into our country they must be prepared, not only to vote money, but to shoulder the rifle themselves and go forth to meet the enemy. Those who have previously had to do so are tired of it. We say that we can manage the Natives without another war; but, if we are forced into a war, let those who so force us prepare to shoulder the rifle, and do as many of us have done, ruining our health in lying out in the open for months while following up the murderers of our friends and relatives. I ask the House to consider the matter carefully, and, if they do so, I venture to say the honorable member for Egmont will have to withdraw his motion, or it will be negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. TOLE.—Sir, I think it is my duty, before the question is brought to a vote, to express my opinion. I intend to say very few words upon the subject. In fact, any honorable gentleman who gets up now to address the House must necessarily be confined to very few words. The honorable member for Selwyn, the other night, said the whole of the argument was not to be on the Government side of the House. Honorable members are so much mixed up in the House at present that it is hard to say which is one side and which is the other; but if there be any arguments on that honorable gentleman's side of the House they have certainly kept those arguments to themselves. Of course the honorable gentleman had a little speech to make, and, after making it, like the honorable member for Wanganui he went out. I am sorry the honorable member for Selwyn did not remain on that occasion in order to hear the excellent disquisition of the honorable member for Newton upon a question in which the honorable member for Selwyn is interested as much as any honorable member—namely, the question of brains. I believe that was one of the finest disquisitions I have heard from any honorable member on that question, and would have been a credit to any of our modern philosophers. The honorable member for Selwyn went on to remark upon the honorable member for the Thames speaking to the gallery; but he must surely have forgotten the speech of the honorable member for Wanganui, the greater part of which, I think, was addressed to the gallery, particularly the "dusty" part. The honorable member for the Thames never addresses the gallery. If he addressed any one in that sense he addressed himself to the country at large, which, on such an occasion, the country requires and will respect him for. But I think it must be admitted that the speech of the honorable member for Wanganui—although there was nothing in it—was addressed to the gallery. I could not help remembering, as a fitting epitaph on that speech, one line of Pope's "Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady,"—

A heap of dust alone remains of thee.

That was the sum and substance of the whole speech. The honorable member for Selwyn said, by way of justification, that these motions were very common—that Sir Julius Vogel moved a vote of want of confidence in 1872. Certainly Sir Julius Vogel did move such a motion in 1872; but not with this indecent haste. Whatever we may say of Sir Julius Vogel, we must admit that he had breadth of conception, boldness in working out that conception, and that he would never make an attack of this kind—proceeding to table a motion of want of confidence one week after his Government had been turned out. On the occasion alluded to by the honorable member for Selwyn, Sir Julius Vogel was out of office a whole month; and, besides, he allowed the financial policy to be brought down, and waited to assail that policy. But in the present instance, before any statement of the position of the country is made, those gentlemen have assailed the Government when they have scarcely a fixed hold upon their seats. From the sympathy which I possess with the present Government it can scarcely be expected that I shall give the motion under discussion much support. Moreover the speech of the honorable member for Egmont was of so hollow a character that it must have disappointed not only himself, but also all those admirers who recently unanimously selected him as the leader of the Opposition. I have frequently listened to the honorable gentleman with very great pleasure and attention. I believe I have listened to him with as much appreciation of his forcible and practical utterances as any one of his admirers. But I certainly think it must be admitted that the speech he made in introducing this want-of-confidence motion was one of the weakest that were ever made in this House. I could not help thinking of the position which the honorable member for Waikouaiti allotted to himself in the late Ministry. He must certainly have repented of having called himself the weakest member of the late Ministry, after hearing his late Premier speak in such a weak manner. The honorable member for Waikouaiti must certainly have felt himself somewhat exalted on hearing that speech. I take it that if a want-of-confidence motion is to have any weight at all it must necessarily attack the policy of the Government against which it is directed. Now, the honorable member for Egmont expressly stated that he would not venture to criticise the policy of the present Premier; but went on to deal with ancillary matters concerning the present Ministry, their personnel, as it is called, and not grounds of real substance. In that respect, and in others, he attempted to plagiarize the mode, though certainly not the time, of the attack of Sir Julius Vogel in 1872. He admitted the wisdom of retrenchment; he admitted the wisdom of an investigation into and simplification of the finances; and he also admitted the necessity of an economical and vigorous prosecution of public works. He admitted, so to speak, all the questions of policy and administration in the Premier's statement. Well, an honorable gentleman in the position of the honorable member for Egmont, who wished to assail the Government on any main points, should not have admitted these things, but should have proceeded on some large questions, and not of an immaterial and personal character. No doubt the honorable gentleman will say in his reply that the whole of the finance dealt with by the Treasurer is to be found in the tables to the Financial Statement first brought down this session. The question is, where to find it. If credit is to be given to the present Treasurer for anything, it must be because he has collected together the whole monetary figures of our position, and, as it were, put on a pin's point our liabilities and the amount which we require to pay them with: in fact, he has put the whole of the finances of the colony into such an intelligible shape as we could never have arrived at from the maze of tables hitherto submitted to the House. If we look at the speech of the honorable member for Egmont we are naturally impelled to this conviction: that he was very unhappy and very confused in his mode of making out his case. He first started by begging the question. He said there was no confidence in the present Government, because it had not the support of a majority of the House. Why, what is the object of the present motion? Is it not only by a vote of the House that we can ascertain whether the Government have a majority? Consequently, in making that rash statement he has failed at once. Then, instead of pursuing an attack, he abruptly appealed to the chivalry of the Premier, and said the only manly course for that honorable gentleman to pursue would be to reject the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers and come to a vote at once: in other words, he says, "Be beaten, and let us come back to office." Then he asked why certain gentlemen who surround the Premier are not allied with him as Ministers. Well, I take it that that is scarcely a question for the honorable member for Egmont to ask. The responsibility of forming a Ministry is entirely the business of and rests with the Premier, and no one else. I do not suppose that, if the honorable member for Egmont got into power and became surrounded with certain honorable members, a want-of-confidence motion would be brought against him on such a ground. Then he alluded to what had occurred in another place, as he calls it, and he complained that the gentleman who occupies the position of representative of the present Government in that Chamber only holds his position for one session. Well, supposing that is the case, we have plenty of precedents for that. We need go no further back than 1872, when we find that Sir Julius Vogel informed the House that Mr. Ormond, the late Minister for Public Works, was going to take the position of Minister for Public Works only for the session, to meet the difficulty of the situation, and that after that session Mr. Richardson would enter the Cabinet and carry on the Public Works Department. He also complains of an expression used by the representative of the Government in another place—namely, the term "conservative"—and he fixes upon that word its technical signification. But he answers himself the objection he raises, because he admits that the Hon. Colonel Whitmore is only to hold office during the remainder of the session. Then clearly so far the Government is acting in a conservative manner, because it is keeping things as they are at present. They promise that there shall be no radical changes during the present session, and that not until next session will they be enabled to bring down a large and general policy. Of course this naturally leads to the question of the formation of the Cabinet, in which it was stated there is not unity of political opinions. In all Cabinets there are open questions and Cabinet questions. In the former, Ministers are free to act as they like, and in the latter they are united to stand or fall by them. An able writer on the subject expresses it thus:—

"Unanimity in the Cabinet is even now a mere phantom. . . . The concert of Cabinets consists at present not in unanimity of opinion (for it is impossible to conceive that all their members will arrive at identically the same solutions of all the complicated questions submitted to their consideration), but in concerted action—that is to say, a sacrifice, greater or less, of individual convictions to the necessity of presenting a strong front against their political opponents."

I take it that that is the real position of Cabinet Ministers in relation to each other, although I would rather use the words "temporary suppression of their opinions," instead of "sacrifice of their opinions." I do not suppose for a moment that the honorable gentlemen who occupy the Government benches at present will to any great extent sacrifice their individual opinions, although they may temporarily suppress them, in order that they may show a bold front to their political opponents. But we need not go far back to find that in this Parliament members of the Cabinet have before to-day held very diverse individual opinions—that they have suppressed their opinions in order to show a bold front to their opponents. We need only remember the positions of the honorable member for Waikato and the honorable member for the Taieri. Those are gentlemen who hold strong Separation views in common, but who are very widely divided upon the question of the Land Fund. I do not think, therefore, that the honorable member for Egmont was happy in adopting that argument as a ground upon which the present Government should be turned out of office. Even if the honorable member for Egmont carried his motion, where would he find a Cabinet which would not be divided upon several large questions? The next objection taken was that the Premier was unable to find gentlemen to fill all the offices. I had taken a note of that, but it was well answered by the honorable member for Hokitika (Mr. Barff), who quoted the words which the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Fox) used under similar circumstances in 1869. I suppose that honorable gentleman (the member for Wanganui) will vote for the motion of the honorable member for Egmont; although, in 1869, when he had only three in his Ministry—himself, Sir Julius Vogel, and Sir Donald McLean—he said,—

“Such a course is not at all unusual, as this House will at once recognize that on many previous occasions a partially-formed Ministry has been presented to His Excellency, and has taken its seat on these benches.”

Those were the words of the honorable member for Wanganui, and, considering the large influence he has exerted in the affairs of the country and his long Parliamentary experience, he must be accepted as an authority. Then the next objection—the strongest objection, and at the same time the weakest—was that there had been delay on the part of the Government in bringing down the Financial Statement. I say it was the strongest objection because it was made the most of; but, at the same time, it was the weakest, because there was the least reason in it. From the very first moment the present Government took their seats upon those benches the honorable member for Egmont showed a most indecent impetuosity in trying to fix a certain day upon the Premier and the Colonial Treasurer to make that Statement. He thought he would trap the Treasurer into bringing down precipitate financial proposals, and thereby charge them with indefiniteness. The honorable member and his friends must have laboured under a delusion consequent on an inordinately lengthy tenure of office. They must have thought that the honorable gentlemen who occupy the Government benches could have at once known all the secrets which were known to those gentlemen who had occupied office for seven or eight years. This was especially unfair under the circumstances. In 1869, the Hon. Mr. Fox, on the occasion of a change of Ministry, used, I may say, precisely the same words which the honorable member the Premier used the other evening—so much so that the Hon. the Premier might have been charged with copying his Ministerial statement from that delivered by the honorable member for Wanganui, who said this in 1869:—

“Then, Sir, as regards the financial arrangements which will be necessary to enable us to carry out these views, I may say that the Colonial Treasurer has had very little time, since he was sworn in, for inquiring into the financial condition of the colony, and making himself master of our actual position.”

That is precisely the position which the present Premier lately took up. He apologized for the circumstances in which he found himself on his recent accession to office, and simply promised that shortly his honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer would bring down a Financial Statement—in the words of Mr. Fox who said, further,—

“I cannot, in the imperfect state of information in which we are on this subject, enter further into the question of finance; but the Colonial Treasurer will, I trust, very shortly be in a position of making a statement to the House.”

And yet the honorable member for Wanganui will vote with the present Opposition. Then, turning to the Statement of the Hon. the then Treasurer (Sir Julius Vogel), made a few days afterwards, when he came down with a Financial Statement in Committee of Supply, we find he used these words:—

“I trust the Committee will bear in mind that I have been but a very few days in office, and consequently have had great difficulty in acquiring the amount of information on the subject which I consider the Committee entitled to.”

All this goes to show that the people who are entitled to the greatest consideration are those who follow into office on occasions like this, as my honorable friend the Premier and his colleagues have done. Then, in 1872, when Mr. Gillies, as Colonial Treasurer, came into office, he had about seventeen days to make his Financial Statement. He took office on the 10th September, and did not bring his Financial Statement down until the 27th September. Thus he had seventeen clear days in which to prepare his financial proposals. At that time, it must be remembered, the debt of the colony amounted only to some £10,000,000, so that, if we are to give time in proportion to the magnitude of our present debt and financial difficulties, we may say that the honorable gentleman who now occupies the position of Colonial Treasurer on those benches should have nearly three times that period in which to prepare his Financial Statement. On the whole, therefore, I consider that the position taken up by the honorable member for Egmont is, to say the least, precipitate, unjustifiable, and diametrically opposed to all Parliamentary precedents in this House. Since the honorable gentlemen have been on this side of the House they have reminded me of the proverbial story of the demure faces that are to be seen on all who have had anything to do with Chancery Courts. It is said that the Chancery Court Judges have very elongated countenances; that the barristers in practice in those Courts also wear very long faces; and, in fact, that even the spectators and the ladies who go into the galleries to view the Court proceedings are affected by the same mysterious agency. Well, that is just the appearance of those honorable gentlemen. They have assumed a tragic face, and put off that comic face and dropped the laughter that they used to indulge in when they were on the Government side of the House. Now, Sir, if we should vote that we have no confidence in the present Administration, I do not know in whom we should say that we have confidence, for surely we cannot have again any confidence in the mover of this motion as Premier. Should the motion be carried we must have a coalition Ministry formed, composed partially of the gentlemen who were turned out and partially of those gentlemen who assisted to turn them out. I do not think the country, therefore, would have any confidence in such an Administration as that. The country must be averse to a coalition of that kind, and if those gentlemen took office it would be but to lose their seats once more. While on this point I must say that I feel pain at seeing gentlemen occupying the position which this majority spoken of by the Opposition, if there be a majority, will occupy. I respect members who vote with their party—I am a strong party man myself, and would make many sacrifices of individual opinion in order to adhere to my party as a whole; but, while I can go so far in admiration, I must say I think the conduct of those gentlemen who can now support the late Government after ejecting them deserves the deepest contempt. On the whole, I am at a loss to know on what ground the honorable member for Egmont tabled his motion. I have turned it over in my mind; I have carefully read the honorable gentleman's speech, and heard what little there was of argument on that side of the House; and I cannot help coming to the conclusion that the object in view is simply to get back to office. Nothing more. The honorable member for Auckland City West gave the late Government a capital name, that of the "tick" Government. Well, Sir, ever since they have been in opposition I have been thinking they are a "tick" Opposition, for all round me, ever since those honorable gentlemen were turned out of office, they have been engaged in ticking off the names on the cards of members. So that, both as Government and Opposition, they may be termed "tick" Government and "tick" Opposition. Sir, I have not the slightest doubt that the country will have very great confidence in the present Government, and I would base my reasons for saying so on the following grounds: First, we have a double strength in the Ministry now for settling the Native difficulty. We have, as Premier, a gentleman who requires not a single word from me to assure the House and the country of the favourable position he occupies in the eyes of the Natives, and of their friendly relations towards him. We have heard telegrams read from Tawhiao, and other leading rebel Natives, expressing a desire to meet him and to establish friendly relations with him on behalf of the European race. And, besides that honorable gentleman, we have also in the Ministry the present Native Minister, whose popularity amongst the Natives of the North Island is undoubted. Then there is another point which must give an assurance of confidence to the country, and which has not been touched upon by any other member who has addressed himself to the House upon this question—that is, the question in regard to petitions. People who send petitions to this House trust that they will have the grievances they complain of redressed during the session. A Public Petitions Committee have a very arduous task in considering these petitions. They go into long inquiries with regard to them, call before them and examine many witnesses, who have to be in attendance from week to week, while the petitioners are kept in constant anxiety as to the result. Then comes up a recommendation from the Committee favourable to the petitioner; and what is the result? I have myself seen many cases in which the late Government over and over again have been asked what they intended to do to give effect to the report, however favourable, of the Committee; and to my regret and, I may say, disgust, I have often heard the answer that the Government would not accede to the recommendation of the Committee. That is a very poor consolation not only to the petitioners, but to the gentlemen who have given so much time and trouble to the consideration of the petitions. If there is anything that will establish confidence in the present Administration, it will be the announcement made by the Hon. the Premier the other day that the Government will in every case, as far as possible, accede to the recommendations of the Public Petitions Committee. It will also have another good effect, for it will give confidence to those gentlemen who examine into the petitions that there will be some beneficial result from their deliberations. While on this subject, I cannot help referring to one matter, which is partly of a personal character and partly of a public character. I presented a petition last year from nearly a thousand of the inhabitants of Auckland and the surrounding districts, with regard to an unreasonable obstruction by the late Government of a public wharf there, named the Wynyard Pier. The allegations of the petition were fully discussed, and the evidence of some of the members of the late Administration themselves was taken; and, after taking that evidence and going into the matter very fully, the Committee arrived at the conclusion that direct access should be given from a certain street to the jetty, the communication to which had been unwarrantably interrupted. I was very much pleased at the terms of that report, because I conceived that it was only doing justice to the public, on whose behalf I had presented the petition. I then asked the late Government whether they would accede to the recommendation of the Committee, and they said "No," and this in the face of nearly a thousand people, who had gone to a great deal of trouble and expense in preparing that petition and presenting it to this House. During the recess I saw the Resident Minister in Auckland, Mr. Whitaker, and introduced several deputations to him. I was then assured that the request of the deputation would be acceded to, but that he must first wait for a report from the Engineer-in-Chief, who was shortly expected in Auckland. That gentleman came up; I interviewed him, and arranged with him to introduce a deputation on the subject of the propriety of carrying out the recommendations of the Petitions Committee. He made an appointment with me—I mention this in order to show the amount of courtesy which can be displayed by some Civil servants—to meet about twenty or thirty of the most influential gentlemen in Auckland; and I arranged that the meeting should take place at eleven o'clock on a certain day. But, to my surprise, on the morning of the day on which I was to introduce the deputation I saw in one of the newspapers that the Engineer-in-Chief had left Auckland the day previously. This he did without informing me, by note or in any other way, that he was leaving; and from that day to this I have not received the faintest explanation from him of conduct which, to say the least of it, was very impolite, and exceedingly discourteous to those gentlemen whom he had appointed to meet. I bring this matter forward to show the trouble people will go to in order to have their grievances redressed, and the necessity there is that Parliament should, if possible, grant that redress without delay. I assert that, if there is anything that will give people confidence in the present Government, it is the fact that they will know that their petitions will be properly attended to, and will receive favourable consideration at the hands of the Government. There is only one point to which I need now refer, and it is one rather of a constitutional character than otherwise. It is the question of whether the present Government should leave those benches in the event of an adverse vote being carried against them. Of course my opinions and exhortations on the subject may or may not be very much heeded; but I say that, on constitutional grounds, they should not establish a precedent by leaving those benches under the circumstances. Notwithstanding that the honorable member for Waikato has said that there is no precedent during the last seventy-five years for a Ministry holding office against the vote of the majority of the House, I say that his statement is contrary to history. Several cases, which it is unnecessary to go into now, have occurred even within the last forty-five years; but the honorable member for Rangitikei went into that point so fully that it is unnecessary for me to speak further on it. I wish, however, to affirm this distinction: that the Government should hold office until the business of legislation is arrested: I do not go into the question of administration. As long as the present institutions are conserved there can be no reason adduced for ousting them from office. There is really now no question before us as to overturning the policy of the country. It is simply a question of administration, and that is admitted even by the honorable member for Egmont and those who, like him, are desirous of going back to office. They have asked for and supported retrenchment, vigorous prosecution of public works, simplification of the finances; and the present Government have promised to carry out all these matters of administration. Therefore, as this is a course impossible of exception by the honorable member for Egmont, there is no reason whatever for ousting the present Ministry upon that question. I will next take the legislative form of the question. The present Administration, when in opposition last year, expressed opinions distinctly in favour of extending the franchise, of having triennial Parliaments, and of a proper administration of the Native land. The present Opposition have admitted the necessity for all that, and, in fact, during the present session have stated that they would, during the recess, consider the question of revising the incidence of taxation—also a question of policy promoted by the present Government. These are questions on which both sides are agreed. On those grounds, I say that, until the present Government are arrested in endeavouring to pass legislation, they should not leave those benches. This is the invariable dictum of constitutional writers. Mr. Disraeli, in a speech he made on a vote of want of confidence in the Melbourne Ministry in 1841, also laid down this distinct doctrine, that "No man contends that, merely because the Government is in a minority in the House, therefore it ought to resign;" and he follows that up by saying, "Next to the assumption of power is the responsibility for relinquishing it." I say that, if we had no other authority than this, it should be sufficient to entitle those honorable gentlemen to maintain their seats. I have nothing further to say upon the question. Although the discussion has been fairly exhausted by other honorable members, and although I labour under great disadvantages in rising at this period of the debate, I felt it my duty, representing, as I do, a very large constituency, to express my opinions. I hope the House will calmly consider the question at issue, and the feelings of the country at large. I have narrowly watched the Press during this discussion, and I can appeal to it to prove that the opinion of the country at large is unanimously in favour of the present Administration having a fair opportunity to express its policy. There is but one newspaper which is of a different opinion, and that is a paper published here, for which I think no honorable member has much respect. If the Opposition had allowed matters to take their ordinary course, the Colonial Treasurer would have delivered his Financial Statement long before this. There would then have been a fair opportunity for discussing the policy of the new Government, and parties might have been arrayed upon some tangible grounds. At present there is really nothing to go upon. The Opposition are merely going upon personal and other grounds which are of a trivial and untenable character. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers will be carried, and that the interests of the country will receive that amount of consideration which they deserve.

On the motion of Mr. W. WOOD, the debate was adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

WELLINGTON CITY LOANS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN moved, That the Bill be recommitted, for the purpose of amending clause 3 as follows—namely, To reinsert lines 4 and 5, and in the 6th line to strike out "three thousand pounds," and insert "two thousand nine hundred pounds three shillings and tenpence" in lieu thereof. He desired to point out that the Council had been labouring under a very great mistake as regarded the appropriation of the money. The idea the Council had was, that the Corporation of Wellington had possession of the present Provincial Buildings, and could use them as they liked. That was not the fact. The Corporation merely occupied two rooms in the Provincial Buildings, for which they paid £100 a year to the General Government. It was an absolute necessity that they should have increased accommodation. At present, the Corporation paid—for the Town Clerk's office £100 a year, for the City Surveyor's office £50, for the Drainage Engineer £100 for two rooms, for the Waterworks Engineer £50 for one room, for the Inspector of Nuisances' Office £40 for one room; and the Corporation paid other rents of £100, bringing the total up to £440 a year. They required £7,000 to build new offices, and that sum at 6 per cent. would amount to £420, and if they borrowed the money and built offices of their own they would have the advantage of being under one roof. At present, great inconvenience was necessarily caused, both to the public and to the Corporation, through the offices of the different departments being separated. The original plan was to build a town hall, with the Corporation offices under one roof, to cost £20,000; but the City Council abandoned that scheme, and reduced their plan to a minimum cost of £7,000 for offices only. What would be the effect of refusing to accept the amendment which he proposed?

The Corporation would simply go and borrow the money. By the 129th clause of the Municipal Corporations Act they could raise the money immediately; but it would be great folly on their part to do so, inasmuch as they had £10,000 in hand unappropriated—money which was idle and which they could not touch. Therefore they had asked the Assembly to allow them to spend £7,000 out of that money in the way proposed. He could not conceive what advantage would be gained by refusing his amendment. The result would only be to complicate matters, and bring this Chamber into collision with the House, and perhaps the latter would ask for a Conference, in which case he was quite satisfied that the Council would give way when it came to have the thing explained. The Bill had been considerably amended in the Council, and with some of the amendments he quite agreed. It was right that whatever balance might be left should go towards drainage purposes rather than towards the improvement of the streets. That was a very proper amendment of the original Bill; but the Council ought to stop there, and he believed that, with the amendment he proposed, the Corporation would be perfectly satisfied. They would have to find money somewhere else for the improvement of the streets, and would have to keep these moneys in reserve for drainage purposes. During a former discussion it had been thrown in the teeth of the Corporation that the city was very badly drained; but the Council must have observed, from late discussions that had taken place on the subject, and by Mr. Napier Bell's report, that great difficulties stood in the way of a proper drainage system. The Corporation were at first going recklessly to work, and they got Mr. Climie's scheme, and proposed to carry it out, until one sensible man in the City Council suggested that, before doing so, they should have the best professional advice available in the colony. Consequently they procured the services of Mr. Bell, an engineer of first-rate abilities, and he had condemned Mr. Climie's scheme in toto. Therefore the Corporation could not be blamed if there had been delay in carrying out drainage works. It was a fortunate thing for the city that the Corporation took the precaution which it did, instead of going into the scheme that was at first proposed, and probably, after expending an enormous sum of money, finding that the works would be a failure. Anyone who would read Mr. Bell's report would see that there was no disgrace attachable to the City Council. He (Mr. Pharazyn) had always been most anxious that there should be some good scheme of drainage. He would like to know, if a Committee of the Council were to sit to consider a scheme of drainage, would it be able, without professional assistance, to devise a system? There had already been £50,000 appropriated for drainage, of which £6,000 had been spent, he believed, with very little result. But things might have been a great deal worse. They might have gone into the scheme recklessly. One gentleman in the City Council, with some professional knowledge, was a great advocate for going headlong into it, but was stopped by the common sense of other Councillors. He trusted the Council would see the reasonableness of the proposal he made. He would not on any account mislead them. He had talked over the subject with some of the City Councillors, and had thought over it, and had arrived at the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary that new offices should be erected. It was monstrous to suppose that the Corporation could carry on their business, having four departments in separate offices as at present, without loss of time and great public inconvenience. He trusted, for the reasons he had stated, the Council would agree to the amendment proposed.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT failed to see anything in the arguments which had been adduced by his honorable friend in support of his proposal. He would oppose the amendment, and would, if necessary, call for a division upon it. The honorable gentleman stated a few days ago that this was a downright swindle, and he (Colonel Brett) indorsed those words.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN explained that all he said on the occasion referred to was that, if the Loan Bill was for £250,000, then it was a swindle; but after it turned out that he was mistaken he apologized.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT said he offered no apology to the Council for saying that this Bill was a downright swindle, and the honorable gentleman had in no manner explained that it was not a swindle, as he hoped the honorable member would have done. The arguments which the honorable gentleman had adduced were very fallacious. What was the Bill for? Its object was nothing more nor less than to misappropriate a sum of £10,000, which was specially appropriated for a particular purpose. The whole matter lay in a nutshell. Some years ago a sum of £200,000 was raised on loan under an Act of the Assembly. Well, what had the Corporation done with that sum? £50,000 of that money was to be expended on drainage, and there was still £10,000 unappropriated, of which sum the City Council now desired £7,000 for the purpose of building new offices. The £10,000 should undoubtedly be devoted to the purpose of draining the city, which at every corner had a cesspool; yet the Corporation proposed to spend £7,000 of this sum in the erection of public buildings, and £3,000 in the formation of streets. That was a misappropriation of money, and he raised his voice against it. Let honorable members look at the disgraceful state of the Town of Wellington. They could not turn the corner of any street without being disgusted with stinks; and, were it not for the tempestuous weather which occasionally occurred, he believed the whole of the inhabitants would be swept away from the face of the earth. That was the only thing that saved the inhabitants. They ought to feel a deep interest in the welfare of this city. It could be made a splendid city; but it was not, owing to the apathy and negligence of the municipal body. That was the cause of the extreme unhealthiness of the city. The blood of members of the Council had been poisoned by this want of proper sewerage. Look at the construction of the city.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

Let any member go to the top of the Terrace and look at the imposition. All the front was gingerbread, and all the rear a mass of filth and dirt. If they walked up and down the pathways they would see there was no drainage. The water flowed over the footpaths instead of being carried off by pipes. If they went up the road in front of the buildings they would see that the work of laying down the gas-pipes was grossly carried out. It was done in a most unworkmanlike manner, and horses could scarcely pass without being liable to break their knees. Now, forsooth, they wanted money to build a town hall. They were not entitled to a town hall. Let them make the streets first, and keep them clean. He would move, That the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL did not think it was at all necessary for them to travel outside the propositions the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn had made, which he thought they were doing when they discussed the question whether the Corporation of the City of Wellington had or had not done its duty to the public in making the streets. Nothing which the honorable gentleman had said shook his view of the course which the Council ought to take in the matter. They must carry their recollection back to what the actual fact of the case was. The Wellington Corporation were not authorized to borrow £200,000. They were only authorized to borrow so much of the sum of £200,000 as was necessary to enable certain things to be done, and to provide a certain amount for the drainage of the city. Having borrowed more money than they were entitled under the law to borrow, they now came to the Legislature and said, "First give us legislative sanction for what we have done in borrowing more money than we were authorized to borrow, and then allow us to apply the extra sum to entirely new objects." Now, it was against that that he considered the Council were justified in taking their stand the other day, and it was on that account he was, with all possible regret, unable to accede to the appeal of the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn for the reconsideration of the clause. Nothing the honorable gentleman had said had gone at all to the root of that part of the matter. It was quite true, everybody admitted, that it was hard the Corporation should have to pay their present rents instead of paying interest for a town-hall site; but then the Corporation ought to have thought of that before they came to the Legislature and asked leave to borrow a specific sum, and before they entered into contracts, without legislative authority, to spend money which the Parliament had not placed at their disposal at all. The Municipal Corporation Act of last year, to which the honorable gentleman had referred, was the very thing to which the Corporation ought to have resorted to raise money to build offices. The City Council should have submitted the question to the ratepayers as to whether the money should be borrowed for the purpose.

The Hon. Colonel Brett's amendment by leave withdrawn.

Question put, "That the Bill be recommitted;"

T. THOMSON.

The adjourned debate was resumed upon the question, That this Council doth concur in the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Thomas Thomson, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Government.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that on a previous occasion he had asked that this motion should be adjourned, so that the Government might be in a position to say what course they would take with respect to it. The Government would give careful attention to the resolution if passed by the Council, but he would not pledge himself that it would be carried out. The Government would promise, however, to give full consideration to the matter.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES rose to support the motion. He thought Captain Thomson was one of the best servants in the employ of the Government in the District of Southland. For the last fifteen years he had been most attentive to his duties. He was most popular amongst the settlers in the district, as well as captains of vessels frequenting the Bluff Harbour. His transfer from the employment of the Provincial Government to the Harbour Board was a calamity so far as Captain Thomson was concerned, because if he had remained in his former position he would have been entitled to a pension; or, if he had been treated as other persons in a similar situation were, he would have received an allowance instead of a pension. He could not see why a different measure of justice should be meted out to Captain Thomson at the Bluff and to Captain Thomson at Port Chalmers. The latter was certainly the superior officer, but the other was an equally efficient man, and no fault was ever found with him. Had the Provincial Government continued in existence, then, with continued service, Captain Thomson would undoubtedly have been entitled to a pension. He understood that Captain Thomson at Port Chalmers had got something like £600 as compensation for the loss of his position under the Provincial Government, and, if he was entitled to such a sum, Captain Thomson at the Bluff was entitled to a sum in proportion to his service. The colony should not allow any injustice to be done in such cases, and the mere fact of a change in the form of government should not prejudice the claims of worthy public servants. He knew from personal observation that Captain Thomson had done signal service to the country. Besides, he was far above the ordinary class of men in similar positions. He was exceedingly ingenious, and had invented several instruments in connection with navigation, among which were a patent anchor, and a gauge for measuring the rise and fall of the tide, which was one of the simplest, most efficient, and most ingenious instruments he had ever seen. Considering the character of Captain Thomson, and the services he had rendered to the State, he thought that gentleman ought not to be placed in a worse position than others in similar situations. He had therefore much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER looked on this as a matter which concerned the Government more than individual members. He had no doubt a great many applications of the same kind would be made; and probably this particular case would be quoted as a precedent to some extent. Probably the Hon. Dr. Pollen could give them a great deal of information upon this matter. To his own knowledge, there was another application from an officer holding a similar position in the Province of Otago, and who was in almost exactly a similar way transferred to another body. He made an application for compensation, but he thought it was refused by the late Government. He had no wish to offer objections to the claim which had been advanced in this instance, but at the same time he wished to say that it was by no means a singular case. Upon the mode in which this question was determined would depend many others.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said the facts of this particular case had gone out of his recollection. Speaking without book, so to say, he understood the position to be this: Captain Thomson was employed under the Provincial Government as Harbourmaster at the Bluff. His services had since been transferred to the Harbour Board, and he claimed that he should receive compensation as an officer deprived of service under the Provincial Government, and that he should still be employed by the Harbour Board. Now, he thought this was a question upon which the Council should not commit itself to any expression of opinion. The Abolition Act made provision for officers who were by the change of the system of government deprived of their employment. But in this particular instance the officer had not been deprived of his employment, inasmuch as he still continued in the same position, the difference being only that his masters were changed. In all other respects he was still a public servant, and still held the office which he held under the Provincial Government. He did not know what particular claims this officer could have, or what injury had been done to him individually and personally by the change of service. He did not know what rights he would have under the Provincial Government to be considered as a Civil Servant. He (Dr. Pollen) believed he would have none at all; and, unless there were legislation of a local character, altogether independent of the provisions of the Abolition of Provinces Act, certainly his claim for special consideration could not be recognized more than the claims of a great many other officers of the Government. A similar transfer had been made in respect to the Harbourmaster at Otago Heads. It was within his own knowledge that a gentleman in Auckland, who filled the office of Chief Clerk in the Superintendent's Office, was transferred from that office and made Secretary to the Board of Education. He suffered no diminution of pay by the change, and it was held, under those circumstances, that he had no claim for compensation; and compensation was refused to him. There were many other instances, no doubt, of the same kind, and, if this were to be taken as a precedent, it would open the door for a large number of claims which would undoubtedly be preferred. It was a question which he thought ought properly to be left to the Government itself, and he did not think it would be well for the Council to express any decided opinion either way.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said the adoption of the resolution would amount simply to a recognition of the services of Captain Thomson, and would not in any way tie down the Legislature or the Government to deal with the case as the petitioner desired. The case of Captain Thomson, supposing the Government should favourably consider it, would not prove a first precedent, for precedents had already been formed, and the fact that a precedent already existed in the particular branch of the service to which Captain Thomson belonged no doubt encouraged him to bring forward this application to the Legislature. The facts which were elicited during the inquiry by the Petitions Committee had rather escaped his recollection, but he knew of similar cases. Notably there was the case of the Harbourmaster at Port Chalmers, who had received such compensation as Captain Thomson here asked for. If there were equitable claims on the part of those who had served in the various departments of the Government in former days, he thought they ought to receive consideration; and, with respect to this gentleman, he could say there were special claims which ought to receive consideration. Captain Thomson was appointed Harbourmaster at the Bluff about sixteen years ago by the Government of Southland. Just before he was appointed a series of unfortunate accidents happened in and near the harbour. Vessels ran ashore, got burnt, and were cast away. Just at that time, when the Bluff became the port of import for the gold fields at Lake Wakatipu, a great rush of vessels came over, and many of them, no doubt, were sent to leave their bones there. Many of them, doubtless, were sent there—as was usual at the port of a new gold field—to get the benefit of the insurance. Many honorable members might recollect that just at that time the Bluff bore a very bad reputation, owing to the number of accidents which had occurred. Then Captain Thomson was appointed, and in a very short time his evident ability gave such confidence to shippers that in a few months the credit of the port rose greatly—one hundred per cent., he thought. Since Captain Thomson had been appointed very few accidents indeed had taken place. One or two had occurred. For instance, the steamer "Scotia," belonging to the Albion Company, ran ashore at Captain Thomson's light station, steering directly for the lantern on his look-out place, the bowsprit very nearly knocking the look-out man off his perch. Captain Thomson had been transferred from one body to another. If mere transference from one authority to another upset the claim of a public officer, Captain Thomson had very little claim; for, first of all, he was in the service of the Southland Government, was then transferred to the Provincial Government of Otago, then to the General Government, and, finally, to the Bluff Harbour Board. But, the nature of his services being still the same under all those various authorities, he should be considered to have been continuously a public servant, and, as such, entitled to consideration. Certainly he was quite as much entitled to consideration as any other harbourmaster who had received consideration. He could indorse every word the Hon. Mr. Holmes had said with reference to Captain Thomson, who was really a man of genius, for the names of his inventions in nautical matters were legion. He had invented a boat-lowering apparatus which was not at all unlikely to supersede all other patents previously designed, and which had received acceptance at the hands of the Marine Board at Melbourne; and he had also invented a patent rowlock, and various other things which he (Mr. Menzies) could not at present remember. He trusted the Council would agree to the recommendation of the Committee, which did not propose anything more than due recognition of the services of this officer.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON said the Hon. Dr. Pollen, in concluding his remarks on this question, stated that he considered it was one which ought to be left to the discretion of the Government. Now, as he understood the question before the Council, that was exactly what was proposed to be done. The Committee recommended that the petition should be sent to the Government for reconsideration. The object of the present motion was to carry out that recommendation, leaving the matter to the consideration of the Government, and not at all to dictate to them what they should do. There were some peculiarities in the case which he thought called for special attention on the part of the Council and the Government, and notably its similarity to the case of the Harbourmaster at Port Chalmers. It seemed that the latter officer had recently been transferred to a local Harbour Board, as in the case of Captain Thomson, and that he had received consideration for such change. These two cases were so similar in their leading features as naturally to suggest that they ought to have been treated alike; and he had no doubt that when they were thus compared the Government would see the propriety of giving effect to the recommendation of the Petitions Committee.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY said that, considering what had been said with reference to this case, and also that other similar cases had been dealt with in a manner satisfactory to the petitioners, he would suggest the following addition to the motion: "with a suggestion that this and similar cases be dealt with upon a liberal and uniform principle."

Amendment agreed to, and motion as amended carried.

OAMARU RESERVES BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER, in moving that this Bill be committed, said it was rather an unfortunate coincidence that the members of the Waste Lands Committee, who had reported unfavourably upon the Bill, were gentlemen who had, almost to a man, opposed the second reading of the Bill, which had sufficiently commended itself to the Council to be read a second time on a majority of 16 to 8. The report of the Committee stated that no sufficient reason had been shown why the Crown should give up any of the remaining part of Block 95. With all deference to the Committee, he thought that very sufficient reason indeed had been shown, and in that respect the Committee had not taken all the evidence which he was in hopes they would have taken. Mr. Donald Reid, who was really the gentleman who negotiated this agreement, was never called by the Committee; and it struck him as a very remarkable thing that the Committee should have abstained from calling that gentleman, because it was well known that he could have given most important evidence, and evidence that, as far as he (Mr. Miller) knew, would have been favourable to the Bill. The Committee said it was desirable that the General Government should retain the remainder of Block 95, but they did not explain why it was desirable. The General Government had plenty of ground in the Town of Oamaru. They had the Post Office Reserve, on which the Post Office was built, and which contained nearly 1½ acres of land; they had the Customhouse Reserve; they had a piece of ground next the railway station of some 5½ acres; they had a large piece of ground containing more than 5½ acres in the Immigration Reserve; and what more did they want? What did the General Government want so much land for in Oamaru, and why did they require this vacant space, which was so much needed by the public for business purposes? It appeared to him that it was altogether beside the mark to claim for the General Government such large reserves when there was ample ground for them to build all their public establishments on. If the Government had a Court-house, a Customhouse, a post office, a telegraph office, and a gaol, they would not require many other public buildings. It should be remembered that the Government were not going to pay any of the rates in the Town of Oamaru, nor were they going to assist the people in constructing such sewerage works as would soon become necessary in Oamaru, or to contribute anything, so far as he knew, towards the cost of the waterworks which were being constructed. All those circumstances ought to be considered, and he hoped that the Council would take the same view that it did when it allowed the Bill to be read a second time. The report of the Waste Lands Committee claimed more than was really required by the General Government. When a number of people met, as they had lately done in the Town of Oamaru, and expressed their views in the way that meeting had done, their wishes should be attended to. At a public meeting held at Oamaru, at which 700 people were present, the following resolution was agreed to:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting the existence in the centre of Thames Street of a break in the building line of over 400 feet, caused by the large vacant space adjoining the Lock-up, is greatly detrimental to the appearance of the town, while also it is a direct loss to the municipality, as the ground would let readily for building sites at a good annual rental; and this meeting is further of opinion that it is absurd that ground so valuable should be used merely as a police paddock, inasmuch as practically for the sake of grazing one or two troop horses a possible revenue of several hundreds a year is sacrificed.

"That this meeting considers that the land in question should fairly be the property of the municipality, provided that a site is secured to the Government for public buildings and for a county gaol in an eligible situation. That it is desirable that when a county gaol is erected it should not be placed in so prominent a position as the present Lock-up, and that the site proposed by the Oamaru Reserves Bill, now under the consideration of the honorable the Legislative Council, is admirably adapted for the purpose, being of ample area, convenient access, and near to the Corporation quarries, which would afford the means of profitable employment of hard-labour prisoners."

There were other resolutions passed, with which he would not trouble the Council. There was no doubt whatever that the somewhat coloured view which the Hon. Mr. Holmes had given of this Bill was not the proper view to take. It was not a question of mere bargain. It was never intended by those who conducted the negotiations on the part of the late Government, of which his honorable friend Dr. Pollen was so distinguished a member, that it should be a matter of bargain. The fact was that the land in question was originally reserved for sites for public buildings. Those public buildings would be much better placed elsewhere, and the Bill provided ample ground on which they could be erected. Therefore he did not think the Committee were justified in saying that it was desirable to retain this land for General Government purposes. If there were any real sanitary objections to this land being built upon, he would be the very last to recommend the Council to pass the Bill; but no such objections existed. There was a wide street on each side of these reserves, such street being two chains in width. The vacant space was in the heart of the town, and was very much required for business purposes, and it was occupied by the General Government for the purpose of feeding two or three police horses. Under these circumstances, he thought the Council might adhere to the view it took in the first instance, and allow the Bill to be committed. It had the approval of the public, it had the approval of the Municipal Council, it had the approval of the late Government, it had the approval of the House of Representatives, it most certainly had his approval, and it had the approval of the Council by a majority of 16 to 8. Such being the case, he thought the Bill should be committed, and such alterations made in it as might be found desirable. The municipal authorities would have no objection whatever to pay down a sum of money at once, on the understanding that the Government would expend it on such public buildings as they thought necessary in the Town of Oamaru. That would obviate any difficulty as to the non-payment of this money. When the Municipality was engaged in so many of those costly enterprises which belonged to every Municipality in a new town, the greatest consideration was due to them. Moreover, from what he might call an aesthetic point of view, he was anxious to see the Bill pass, because he desired to see the street become—what he was certain it would be—one of the most beautiful streets in the colony; and he was very much astonished to find that a gentleman with such a large appreciation of the beautiful as they all knew his honorable friend Sir F. Dillon Bell possessed, should have agreed to a report like that which had been submitted. He thought he had said quite enough to show that this Bill ought to be committed and passed.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL very much regretted that it should fall to his duty to move that the Bill be committed that day three months. He could not allow the address which had just been made to the Council to pass without stating that, so far as he and those who agreed with him in the Waste Lands Committee were concerned, nothing which the honorable gentleman had said could shake their view at all. When this Bill came on for second reading his honorable friend Mr. Holmes brought down some very serious arguments against it, and to some members of the Council it had appeared that the Bill was a preposterous one. But it was allowed to be read a second time because it was felt that it would receive full investigation before the Waste Lands Committee. Therefore, when the Hon. Mr. Miller took credit to the Bill for the majority with which it passed the second reading, it should be remembered that it would not have received anything like that majority if it had not been for the feeling on the part of honorable members that the allegations of the Hon. Mr. Holmes, which were new to several of them, would receive a fair sifting by the Committee, which allegations were to the effect that the Municipality had an enormous quantity of land already, and could not reasonably apply to the Legislature for more. The promoter of the Bill in the other House appeared before the Committee, and, in answer to questions, urged that the land proposed to be given up under the Bill was to be given up by the Corporation as a consideration for the General Government land which it was proposed to take. The Committee immediately proceeded to examine what the sections were. They found that the Bill dealt with a section called No. 5, in a particular block; four other sections, called 6, 7, 8, and 9 respectively, in the same block; No. 27, in the same block; and the remaining portion of a reserve known as No. 95. The Committee found that section 5 was proposed to be vested by the Bill in the Crown, whereas the land undoubtedly already belonged to the Crown: in respect to that, therefore, the great consideration proposed to be given by the Oamaru Corporation was nothing. They then found that section 27, which the Bill proposed to vest in the Corporation, already vested in that body; and therefore the consideration that was proposed to be given in respect to that section was also nothing. But when they came to investigate what the Corporation proposed with respect to sections 6, 7, 8, and 9, they found that all these sections, constituting an acre of ground, had been duly dedicated, in a lawful way, for a market; and they found that the Bill proposed to take two of these sections from the public and hand them over to the Crown to do what it liked with, and to take the other two and hand them over to the Corporation to do what they liked with. That was the "consideration" which the Corporation at Oamaru offered to the Crown for getting these Government reserves. The honorable member (Mr. Miller) spoke about there being large quantities of land belonging to the General Government and at its disposal in the Town of Oamaru. No evidence of that was afforded before the Committee. On the contrary, when they came to inquire into the actual position of Block 95, which the Bill proposed to deal with, they found that the whole of that block, with the exception of the piece of land which the Corporation now wanted to take, had already been dedicated by Act to recreation and other purposes; and they found, therefore, that, with the exception of the site of the Post Office, the site of the Telegraph Office, and other sites which had been granted for an Athenæum and other purposes, the General Government had no land in Oamaru suitable for their own objects. There was a piece of land, known as the Esplanade, part of which, properly speaking, might still be considered to belong to the General Government; but, with the exception of what was used for the purposes of a railway station, it was given away to the Harbour Board. Everybody acquainted with that part of the country knew that the railway accommodation was insufficient, and if the whole reserve had been devoted to that purpose it would not be too much. The Hon. Mr. Miller spoke about a few horses being depastured upon the piece of ground which the Corporation proposed to take from the Crown, but the fact of a few horses being depastured upon it now had nothing to do with the question. They knew that at the present moment the population of Oamaru was not more than 6,000, but they also knew that it would soon be a very large town, and become the depot for an area of fine country extending over about 200,000 acres, and including the southern part of Canterbury. Ever since he had been in this country he had fought as strongly as he could to prevent open spaces in towns from being blocked up by buildings. In many of the towns that were growing up and becoming populous, the Corporations were taking every bit of open ground they could get. In another Bill—the Dunedin Town Hall Site Bill—he had been the means of stopping the taking away of a market reserve, and preventing the Corporation of Dunedin from getting hold of it; and with respect to that matter he ought to take the opportunity of saying that Mr. Stout, the promoter of the Bill in the other House, had acted with fairness and justice before the Waste Lands Committee. There was also another Bill, the Dunedin Reserves Bill, where exactly the same thing was proposed to be done—where land duly laid apart for recreation purposes was proposed to be taken and handed over to the Corporation of Dunedin. The Corporation of Oamaru was richly endowed—next to Dunedin it was the most wealthily endowed Municipality in New Zealand—and if it wanted land it could well afford to buy it. He hoped the Council would have some regard to the future of the towns, and not allow the few remaining open spaces to be handed over to Corporations. If they gave way to Oamaru in this matter, as certainly as the sun shone in the sky that Corporation would come up by-and-by with another Bill, doing exactly what the Corporation of Dunedin was trying to do—namely, taking the recreation reserve which adjoined this piece of ground, for the purpose of building upon it. They would come up session after session until they got hold of this piece of land, merely for the sake of adding to their revenue, and preventing the making of rates. He wished to speak with admiration of the manner in which the Corporation of Oamaru and the townspeople had acted in the matter of public works; every one would concede that they had been spirited and generous in regard to the wants of the inhabitants; but in this case they were proposing to take away the only remaining good piece of land which belonged to the Government in the centre of the town, and take away from the public their Market Reserve, without giving anything whatever in exchange. As to the proposal to spend £5,000 in building the gaol, he hoped the time had not come when the Colony of New Zealand would have to go to a Corporation to provide money for such an object; besides, in all probability this expenditure of money for a gaol would never be required at all. The administration of justice went in the direction that long-sentenced prisoners tried at Oamaru would be sent either to Lyttelton or to Dunedin, and no gaol of any size would be required at Oamaru: in fact, they ought rather to prevent the building of anything like a county gaol for long-sentenced prisoners at Oamaru. Therefore, when the Corporation said they would spend £5,000 when called upon, they were offering to do what they were never likely to be asked to do. His honorable friend said Oamaru would give £5,000 in cash to be spent on any other buildings. He must say that if such a proposition were made between private persons it would not be considered reputable. The honorable gentleman would not suspect him of saying that in a personal or offensive manner; but the colony did not want either the money or the buildings, and what the colony ought to do was to keep its own reserve, and also keep the Market Reserve, which had been given to the district and not to the population of the town alone. Every market reserve belonged to the district which supplied the town, and the country people had an inherent right to be considered. The honorable gentleman blamed the Waste Lands Committee for not calling Mr. Reid, a member of the late Government, who had been a party to this engagement. He could not concede that the Waste Lands Committee were to blame. That Committee invited the Hon. Mr. Miller and Mr. Hislop, the promoters of the Bill in both Houses, before them. The Committee would gladly have heard Mr. Reid if those gentlemen had called him; but it was not the duty of the Waste Lands Committee to do more than examine in favour of a Bill the witnesses tendered by those who promoted it. He was sorry Mr. Reid had not been before the Committee, in order that he might have explained how it was he had entered into a treaty between the Government and the Corporation relating to the removal of Her Majesty's Gaol, when the Colonial Secretary—to whose department all those matters would ultimately come—was unaware, when the Bill was under consideration in the Council, that any such arrangement had been made at all. The Committee would have asked Mr. Reid to account for that, and to show them how it was that the Minister of Justice and the Colonial Secretary were unaware of the transaction. Even supposing it to be perfectly true with regard to what the honorable gentleman said—that no reason had been shown in debate why the General Government should keep this reserve—he would ask his honorable friend whether he really considered any reason had been shown why the Corporation should get it.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—Rates.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—To save rates? The Corporation were in a wealthy position. They had splendid municipal reserves; and if they wanted to bring in water to the town, or to secure anything for the well-being or sanitary condition of the town, he was sure they would only have to ask the Legislature in order to get authority for whatever they wanted. Moreover, under the Municipal Corporations Act of last year the Corporation had all the powers they required for such purposes; and he had yet to learn that it would be at all advisable for this Legislature to allow the Corporations of towns all over the country to get hold of the last pieces of ground left to the General Government, merely for the purpose of saving themselves from the small portion of rates which they would otherwise have to pay. He would move, That the Bill be ordered to be committed that day three months.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be committed that day three months.

SLAUGHTERHOUSES BILL.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was one of a class rendered necessary by the alteration made in their local institutions last year. He thought that all the alterations he had seen in this Bill since it was first introduced were decided improvements. He had, however, given notice of a small alteration in the proviso to the 7th clause. It had also been suggested to him that very likely it would be difficult to provide for slaughterhouses which were already existing at some little distance from a township, and which were claimed by both the borough and the county. New slaughterhouses in future would, of course, belong under this Bill to the borough; but it was not very clear that the existing slaughterhouses would follow that rule. All the precautions for preventing dishonesty in slaughtering cattle that were necessitated by the condition of things in this country were provided for. At the same time, there was no unreasonable interference with private convenience in slaughtering animals for domestic use. The clause by which it was rendered imperative that no new slaughterhouse should be erected within a borough, or within a distance of half-a-mile of a borough, was, he thought, a valuable sanitary precaution. However attached people might be to the particular Provincial Ordinance which ruled in the part of the country in which they happened to reside, he thought few people, on reading the general Bill here proposed, would find any valid reason for preferring any of the Ordinances proposed to be repealed. There was nothing in the Bill which was likely to grate upon local feelings or prejudices, and it would be a decided advantage to set at rest the question of slaughterhouse management, because the local Provincial Ordinances overrode the by-laws of the County Council, and for practical management the law as it stood was quite insufficient.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said he gathered from the remarks of the Colonial Secretary that it was not the intention that the Act should allow abattoirs to be erected within boroughs. While the 6th section of the Bill permitted them to continue if already erected, clause 8 actually authorized them to be erected in a borough. He thought the Bill in that respect would require amendment. No slaughterhouse should exist within a certain distance of a borough. One of the knotty points in connection with this question was how to verify the brands at the meat-preserving establishments. That had been felt in the South to be an extremely difficult point to settle, and he had no doubt whatever that cattle-stealing on a very considerable scale might take place, and had taken place, where there were facilities for disposing of the cattle at some of the meat-preserving establishments, seeing that, where cattle were slaughtered at the rate of fifty a day, there would be no possibility of verification after a few days had passed. Whether the Council, during the progress of the Bill through Committee, would be able to make some specific provision to deal with such a case he did not know. He did know that in the Provincial Council of Otago the question was under the consideration of a Committee during two successive sessions, and, beyond passing stringent regulations for recording the brands, they did not see any practicable mode of preventing the possibility of irregularities.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT thought that clause 29 of the Bill distinctly met such cases as the honorable gentleman referred to.

Bill read a second time.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

When the adjourned debate was called on the question, That this House has no confidence in the Government; and the amendment, That, as the Government have not yet declared their policy, this House declines in the meantime to entertain the question of "confidence" or "no confidence" in the Ministry,

Mr. SPEAKER called upon Mr. W. Wood, on whose motion the debate had been adjourned.

Mr. Wood not being in his place, Mr. SPEAKER inquired whether any other honorable member wished to address the House.

No honorable member appearing willing, Mr. SPEAKER said he would put the question if the House desired.

There being no movement in the House, Mr. SPEAKER then said,—I will proceed to put the question.

Accordingly Mr. SPEAKER rose and put the question, and called for the "Ayes" and "Noes," and the voices were given both in the affirmative and negative.

Before Mr. SPEAKER declared which had it,

Mr. McLEAN rose and said,—Sir, I regret to have to speak at this moment, particularly as the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches seem very fidgety. There is in the country from which I come a weed called a nettle, and I am inclined to think some one has placed some of that weed on the seats of the honorable gentlemen, for they seem somewhat uncomfortable. A good deal has been said about the action of members on this side of the House; but we are prepared to allow our conduct to be judged by the result of the division. The Premier and I have been in Australia, and he knows that there is in that country an animal called a kangaroo-rat, which takes prodigious hops. There are some such rats on the Government side of the House; and I am afraid that, if the Government do not allow the division to take place soon, they will find some of their supporters hopping over here like kangaroo-rats. The Colonial Treasurer was kind enough a few days ago, after he made that celebrated Financial Statement, to give me a list of his figures, with which I mean to deal presently. I have no objection to the honorable gentleman telling us that he manages a large timber business in New Zealand. I have no objection to his telling us also that the name of Larnach is well known on the Stock Exchange. The honorable gentleman's uncle is known there, and I believe there is also a McLean on the list of membership, although it is not my name. I have no objection to the honorable gentleman making these statements; but when an honorable gentleman takes his position on those benches he should be very guarded in what he says about the finances of the colony. It is not so important that members on the Opposition side of the House should not be a little inaccurate in their statements, but gentlemen on the Ministerial benches should not make wild statements upon finance, or assert that the figures furnished by the late Government are incorrect, without satisfying themselves that such was the case. Upon this point I may say that the statement of my honorable colleague who lately filled the position of Colonial Treasurer is absolutely correct, notwithstanding the contrary assertions of the present Colonial Treasurer. I will show to the House a few of the misstatements made upon this matter. The honorable gentleman takes his standpoint upon the balance existing on the 30th June last, as shown by my late colleague, and he said that that was £19,895,000. I can make that agree with the late Financial Statement by taking off the one million that was borrowed from the Bank. That will make the figures exactly coincide; but the honorable gentleman, when he took those figures, did not take into account the cash in hand on 30th June last, which amounted to £980,000, or the £35,000 Defence Loan. These two sums were not deducted; neither did he take the Sinking Fund, which was cash in hand on the 30th June, and it is surely proper that that should be taken into account.

Mr. READER WOOD.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the cash or bonds are there, they must be deducted from our debt. If the bonds are repurchased, I do not know why they should not be taken off the total debt.

Mr. READER WOOD.—He could not do it.

Mr. McLEAN.—Well, there is the Sinking Fund, which is invested in New Zealand securities bought up out of this £19,895,000. Is it not correct that that should be taken off? If the honorable gentleman had looked at Table A of the Financial Statement, he would there have found that the Loan Act of 1866 has mentioned in it a sum of £1,000,000. That is included in the £19,895,000. That was taken off, and the honorable gentleman has put it on again, which is quite right; but I presume that the honorable member did not know that the million therein mentioned was the same. Then he adds the £800,000 of Imperial guaranteed debentures. If he had looked into the Financial Statement of my honorable friend he would have found that also included in the £19,895,000. Then, Sir, he went on to this £300,000 that is taken from the Revenue Account and paid back to the Public Works Account, so as to balance that account on the 30th June. And then the Premier took great exception to this, and said that it was merely shifting figures from one place to another; but why did not the honorable gentleman object to this when the Public Revenues Bill was passing through the House? I should like to know, Sir, how you could make a Statement to this House if you did not take the £300,000 borrowed from one account without making an entry placing it back, so as to state the accounts exactly. What shifting of figures is there there, I should like to know? I do not see why the honorable gentleman should object to it now, when he allowed the Public Revenues Bill to go through this House authorizing it, without making the slightest objection.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sorry to interrupt the honorable member, but I find now that, as the "Ayes" and "Noes" have already been called for on this question, the debate is at an end, and therefore the honorable gentleman cannot speak. I had put the question and the voices had already been given when the honorable gentleman rose. There was a doubt in my mind at the time, but I was unwilling to interrupt the honorable member until I had ascertained the precise rule; but I have now referred to Standing Order 118, which will show that this debate is absolutely concluded. Standing Order No. 118 says, "No member may speak to any question after the same has been put by Mr. Speaker, and the voices having been given in the affirmative and negative thereon." Therefore the debate is concluded once the voices have been given. When the voices both in the affirmative and the negative have been given, it is quite clear that the debate is at an end. It is not necessary that the Speaker should have declared which of the voices preponderate. I shall now put the question in extenso.

Mr. REID.—I rise to a point of order, Sir.

The point of order to which I wish to draw your attention—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think the honorable gentleman is entitled to speak. The rule I have read shows that the debate is concluded.

Mr. REID.—Might I ask—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is out of order.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to know—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Chair. Order.

Mr. McLEAN.—I wish to know whether—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The honorable member is out of order.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir,—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is not in order.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, you do not know what I am going to ask. What I ask is this:—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Order. Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is out of order in asking a question. The question is absolutely being put.

Major ATKINSON.—But, Sir, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I shall proceed to put the question. If the House will not support me I shall be very sorry. I regret that I have to call the honorable gentleman to order.

Major ATKINSON.—I must sit down, Sir; but I must say—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is out of order.

Mr. McLEAN.—Sir, might I be permitted to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable gentleman to sit down.

Mr. McLEAN.—Sir,—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I shall proceed to put the question.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I must—

Mr. REES.—Call the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Major ATKINSON.—I wish to address the Chair. I wish to ask your ruling, Sir,—

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the House does not support me, it is useless for me to endeavour to preserve order. I shall proceed to put the question despite this unseemly interruption. The original question was—

Mr. McLEAN.—Will you allow me—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The original question was, "That this House has no confidence in the Government." It has been proposed to amend that question by omitting all the words after the word "That," for the purpose of inserting these words: "as the Government have not yet declared their policy, this House declines in the meantime to entertain the question of 'confidence' or 'no confidence' in the Ministry."

Question put, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

Ayes	...	...	...	...	39
Noes	...	...	...	...	39

Mr. Reid

Mr. Cox,	Mr. Reader Wood,
Captain Kenny,	Mr. Bastinga,
Mr. Wason.	Mr. Lusk.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It becomes my duty to give my casting vote; of course I have no alternative but to give it. I give it on these grounds: I give it in order that there may be further opportunity for the House knowing its own mind. Therefore I give it with the "Noes."

Mr. STAFFORD.—I wish to ask your ruling on a question. An honorable member gave his voice with the "Ayes" when the question was first put by you, and he subsequently voted with the "Noes."

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable member give me the name?

Mr. STAFFORD.—The honorable member for Geraldine.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As a rule, I may state that the vote goes with the voice.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I desire to say that the question was put several times owing to the anxiety of the honorable member for Waikouaiti and the honorable member for Egmont to prolong the discussion. It was put again and again, as you are aware, and at one of those puttings of the question I did inadvertently say "Aye" instead of "No," not exactly observing the manner in which the question was being put. When the question was finally put I gave my voice in a tone loud enough to wake the dead. There could not have been the slightest doubt on the mind of any honorable member as to which way I was going to vote. I would ask your ruling on this point: Whether it is not the final "Noes" that settles the question; because I might have changed my mind on the question during the three or four minutes that intervened.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think that, under the circumstances, and with the explanation of the honorable member, I should be justified in altering the vote arrived at. The honorable member has explained that in the first instance he made a mistake, but on the final occasion of putting the question gave his voice in the direction in which he recorded his vote. I do not think I should be justified in altering the vote as it appears on the division list. The question now before the House is, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

Major ATKINSON.—I move, as an amendment, the addition of the following words: "That this House expresses its opinion that, as the Government has not a majority, it should immediately resign."

Mr. O'ROBKE.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable gentleman having already spoken, he cannot move an amendment.

Hon. MEMBERS.—The motion has been struck out.

Major ATKINSON.—I submit that this is a new question.

Mr. STOUT.—The honorable member cannot move an amendment on his own motion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am of opinion that this is a new question. If the honorable gentleman had got up and proposed an amendment to the original motion the case would be different. Now there is a new question before the House. That certain words proposed to be inserted be so inserted. The honorable member wishes to modify those words, and he is at liberty to do so.

Major ATKINSON.—I will not move it. My honorable friend the member for Waikouaiti will move it.

Mr. McLEAN.—Before I proceed to move this amendment, I wish to say a few words with regard to what transpired before the division was taken. You are well aware, Sir, that there is no one in this House more ready to bow to your ruling than I am. When I got up to speak, if you had stated that the question was in that position that I could not speak, I would have sat down without saying one word, and would have felt quite satisfied. I was allowed to go on with my speech until I got into the half of it; and when I was, as it were, in the middle of the finance, and showing where the honorable gentleman had made a grievous mistake, I—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is out of order. These remarks are not relevant to the question he is now going to move. I understood that the honorable member for Egmont got up and indicated a motion to the House, and asked my opinion. I ruled in his favour, and he then said he would place the motion in the hands of the honorable member for Waikouaiti. I presume the honorable member is now going to move that motion. The remarks he has just been making with regard to a point of order previously raised are not relevant to this question. I say this for his information and that of the House: that a great indulgence was shown in permitting the honorable member to make his speech. He was allowed to go on until I had perfectly satisfied myself, with the assistance of the Clerk of the House, that he was out of order, so that it might not appear that I had unnecessarily interrupted him, or had not granted him that indulgence which I desire to extend to every honorable member. It ought not to be made a charge against the Speaker that he had interrupted an honorable member in the course of a speech none of which he ought to have been permitted to deliver. If I had strictly done my duty I should have immediately stopped the honorable member. I did not think the honorable member would recur to the question again. If the honorable member, or any honorable member of this House, has anything to bring forward to impugn the Speaker's ruling, it is perfectly competent for him to do so at the proper time and by motion. If the honorable member is going to bring forward a new motion, it is not proper for him to speak of anything excepting what is relevant and pertinent to that motion.

Mr. McLEAN.—What position do I now stand in? I have delivered but a portion of my speech. Am I to be prevented from speaking again?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I will put it to the honorable member himself whether he has any claim to continue a speech none of which ought to have been made.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am quite satisfied with your decision, Sir. I am very sorry if I expressed too great warmth on this matter; I did feel it very keenly at the time I was stopped. I have no desire to follow up the matter any further. After such excitement, it is very difficult for an honorable member to take up the point of the speech at which he left off, and, if I begin to go over it again, I hope the House will bear with me. As I was saying at the time, in moving this amendment—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am very sorry to get up again. I am afraid the honorable gentleman has not understood me aright. I ruled that the honorable member was quite out of order—that he had no claim to finish a speech no part of which should have been made, and that he should only refer now to what is relevant to the motion he is now going to move. The honorable member is entirely out of order in continuing a speech on the point of order previously raised, and I hope he will confine himself, after this remonstrance, to that which is pertinent to the resolution he is about to move, and of which the House already has cognizance, and that he will not continue a speech a part of which he has already delivered.

Mr. McLEAN.—I will not continue the same speech. I do not wish to go over the language again, and burden Hansard. I am anxious, as far as possible, to relieve Hansard of reporting what I have already said, so that I shall not go back and say it over again. Therefore, in moving this amendment, I shall endeavour to speak to the question. I move the addition of these words to the motion which is now before the House: "That this House expresses its opinion that, as the Government has not a majority, it should immediately resign." This will be seen by the division that has been taken; it has been a catch division entirely. ("No.") Honorable members may say "No." They know perfectly well that there are three of our members absent, otherwise the division list would be in a different state. What is the case now, Sir? Those honorable gentlemen are obliged to you for your casting vote to keep them on their seats. Do you think for a moment that any body of men, having a proper respect for their position, could sit on those benches on the casting vote of the Speaker—"Oh!"—and with the perfect knowledge that three members of the Opposition were absent when the vote was taken? Let them test it now. Let them take the division over again on this amendment, and then they will see in what position they are, as some of the members of our party who were absent have turned up. When my honorable friend the member for Egmont moved his resolution the Premier got up and said he accepted the challenge, and declined to accept the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers; but what do we see now? We find those honorable gentlemen only too glad to shelter themselves behind that amendment, although they told us they would not accept it, and would stand or fall by the result of the resolution. They have even to take the casting vote of you, Sir, to keep them in their places.

Sir G. GREY.—I rise to a point of order, Sir. Ought not the honorable member to give notice of this amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No. I do not think the honorable member requires to give notice of it. He is quite in order.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not know when I shall be allowed to proceed with my remarks. The honorable gentleman is very touchy now, but I recollect that, when he sat at this side of the House and said very bitter things of us, we never called the attention of the House to any words he used. I am sorry he cannot sit easily in his seat, and I wish honorable members on this side would put something there to enable him to sit more comfortably. Returning to what the Treasurer said, I may point out, as I have already said, that the £300,000 which was taken from the Public Works in aid of revenue was so taken to allow facilities for the payment of interest. The honorable gentleman made no objection to that when it was passing through the House in the Public Revenues Bill. I say that it was a perfectly fair transaction—a transaction which was perfectly right and proper in itself—and when these transfers were made at the end of the financial year they were made to balance the accounts and show exactly how each account stood. Then, again, this £300,000 is already included in the £19,895,000 of debt, and the honorable member has no right to add it to that sum. And then, Sir, the honorable gentleman lets us into a little of his policy. What does he do? He puts in amongst his figures a deficit of £167,000.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable member is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member is not out of order, so far. At the same time, I think he is rather straining the rules.

Mr. McLEAN.—I have really not spoken to this question before. I conceive we are discussing an amendment to the motion, and that I am perfectly in order in what I say, notwithstanding what the honorable member may assert.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I beg to say I said nothing. I merely asked your ruling, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member will assume that I have ruled otherwise than that he is in order I cannot help it. I have said clearly that, although the House might strain the rules as I thought the honorable gentleman was doing, still I did not think he was out of order.

Mr. McLEAN.—Notwithstanding your ruling, Sir, I look upon this as a continuation of the same question, and I am endeavouring to speak upon that. How does the Treasurer propose to make up this deficit of £167,000 which he says there is in the estimated revenue? He proposes to borrow money to make it good. Is not that a part of the policy of the Government—that they are going to borrow money to make good the deficit? As far as the deficit went in our time, we showed clearly how we were to get the money in order to make good the deficit, and also to provide for education and other matters which were now thrown upon the revenue. I have heard it stated, and it has been stated in some of the newspapers in the South, that they found that what was asserted to be a surplus of £148,000 was really a deficit of £180,000, thereby mixing last year's surplus with the present year's deficiency. My honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer showed that, if we had to pay for education and other matters out of ordinary revenue, there would be a deficit of £180,000, and he showed how he was to provide the means to make that good. The present Government say that, in order to make good the current year's deficiency, they will have to borrow £167,000. That is part of their policy which they have unwittingly let out in this very small Financial Statement of the Treasurer. I then come to another item, "Lyttelton Harbour Works, £100,000." If the honorable gentleman had only taken the trouble to look into Table A of the Financial Statement of the late Treasurer, he would have found that this also was included in the £19,895,000; and yet he adds this and other items, which are already included in our debt, to show that the actual debt of the colony is £24,162,000. To illustrate what the honorable gentleman states of the finances, as the colony is in debt £19,000,000 and that sum is coming due, and as he is forced to borrow an equal sum to pay it off, by his argument the colony would owe £38,000,000. Then he adds discount on the £5,000,000 loan at 6 per cent. on a 4½ per cent. loan—£300,000 on raising a loan which has not yet been raised. If he does not want any deficiency on the loan, he has only to raise the interest a little, and he will be able to float it at par, when there would be no discount. We had hoped, before these damaging statements were made, that the Inscription of Stock Bill would have passed, and that we should have been able to float these 4½ per cent. debentures at par in London. I therefore cannot see that it is fair to add £300,000 for discount on a loan which has not been raised. How can he possibly add that to the debt of New Zealand? Taking these sums I have mentioned into consideration, which have been twice taken into account by the Colonial Treasurer, it will be found that the debt of New Zealand is just what my late colleague stated it to be. Then the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government told us the other night that in calculating our deficiencies we must place amongst them the disputed claims of contractors, £170,000, which he said were proper claims, and would have to be paid.

Sir G. GREY.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—Well, Sir, I must have misunderstood the honorable gentleman, and I shall be very glad if he will now distinctly state that it is not so. He has, however, led the country to believe that it was a proper thing to take in those claims. As far as I recollect the honorable member's words, they were to this effect: that these £170,000 of claims by contractors would have to be paid; that the one £800 claimed had to be settled in full, and consequently all the rest must be settled.

MINISTERS.—No, no.

Mr. McLEAN.—That, to my recollection, was the statement of the honorable gentleman; and, to show that I am right, I may say that I have seen it quoted in the papers. If it is not correct, the sooner it is so stated the better, and I am very glad to hear a contradiction of it now. After looking carefully into the claims as stated in the papers, I say they have no right to be recognized in any way. I find that many of those claims are at the present moment the subjects of litigation. Under those circumstances the Premier should never have made such a statement as he did. To make such a statement under the circumstances is as much as to say to every one, "Come in with your claim, and we will settle it in full." Then he says that there is a deficiency in the revenue of New Zealand. Does he know where the money comes from to construct these railways? Did it not come out of loan? Are not these claims in respect to contracts on the railways, and, if they have to be paid, should they not be paid out of loan? No doubt there is a great deal in the fact that, to a certain extent, juries will always go against a Government in deciding upon claims against it; but that is certainly no reason why the Premier should say that these claims ought to be recognized. It is an encouraging of litigation which ought never to be given. If these claims are such that they will have to be paid, they will have to be added to the cost of the construction of those railways. That would come out of loan. It is not a matter of revenue, as railways are constructed by means of loans. Then, Sir, the honorable gentleman proposes to take a loan of £2,000,000, just the same as we did. He proposes to borrow for public works £1,200,000. That is just what we proposed. We proposed to spend the balance in freeing the £800,000 worth of guaranteed debentures, so that these might be available at any time, and the Government never reduced to a strait for want of money. The honorable member was also pleased to remark that the borrowing of a million from the banks was a pawnbroking transaction. So far as that goes, the first £500,000 was borrowed for the purpose of filling up the gaps in our railway system in the South, until which were filled up there could be no proper return from the southern railways. That was a great object to achieve. But the successful borrowing of that £500,000 had another advantage. It showed our independence. It showed the people in the London money market, who are continually decrying our securities, and declaring that we must not go there for money, that we could find that an institution which has branches in all parts of the colony, and which is quite capable of obtaining the fullest information of our affairs, was willing to lend us half a million, and even to go further than half a million if we wanted it. The transaction was a good one, and the terms equal to those obtained when the last loan was raised in London. It is the first time I ever heard of any one disputing that it was a good transaction. Then we made arrangements here with our own bank on terms still more favourable. We arranged to receive a million of money so as to carry on our public works and prevent any stoppage taking place. I am perfectly sure that the honorable gentleman, in his own mind, considers these transactions first-class transactions.

Sir G. GREY.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then he is the first man in the colony I have heard throw a doubt upon it. Then the honorable gentleman read a long list from the Treasury, in which he stated that it was necessary to provide in London, by February next, £130,000, to meet demands there; and he made this statement as if he would have the House believe that the late Government made no provision to meet the liability of the colony in that direction. But he will find, on inquiry, that we did make arrangements with the Bank of New Zealand to provide for all these matters; and that, as a matter of fact, the money is now at his service in London at any moment he likes to call upon it. We never left the colony in financial straits such as that. We looked ahead, and provided money far beyond present wants, in order that there should be no stoppage in those works necessary to be carried on; but we did not adopt the plan the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government spoke about the other night. He said that although we were in this position we need not be in want of money—we could sell plenty of land. That is different from what the honorable gentleman used to say when he sat on this side of the House. He did not suggest then to sell large blocks of land, but now he has no objection to sacrificing the public estate for the purpose of getting in money to carry on these necessary public works. I wish to impress this upon the House. He said that there was plenty of money from the sales of land, so that the country need not be afraid of wanting money.

Mr. W. WOOD.—Read in Hansard.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not care for Hansard. My ears are very good, and I need not trouble myself to read Hansard. The honorable gentleman may alter his speech. I know that he has done that before to-day.

Sir G. GREY.—I rise in personal explanation. I said nothing of the kind that the honorable gentleman says I said.

Mr. McLEAN.—I have a note here of what the honorable gentleman said. I took a note at the time. He said, "We need not be afraid of want of money. There was plenty coming in from the large land sales."

Mr. REES.—Read the note you have, as it is.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not quote it in full, but I generally take a note of what the honorable gentleman says, and that will be found to be pretty well the substance of what he said.

Mr. W. WOOD.—I rise to a point of order. An honorable member having flatly denied the remarks attributed to him by another honorable member, is not the honorable member so attributing such remarks bound to accept the denial? He might, I submit, be in order in quoting Hansard, but not from a memorandum of his own.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is usual for an honorable member to accept another's denial, and I did not understand that the honorable member declined to accept the denial.

Mr. McLEAN.—No. I have the statement here in Hansard. The honorable member says,— "With regard to the assets of the colony, I need hardly say that, looking at its vast capabilities, and to the large sums now being realized from the sale of lands—which is a most natural proof of its wealth—there can be no doubt that any funds the liberality of this House may place at the disposal of the gentlemen who may for the time being be conducting the affairs of the country can very easily be obtained on fitting terms, and that any financial difficulty must be only of momentary pressure, lasting only as long as this House pleases, and no longer."

I do not know what honorable members generally think of that statement, but to me it appears that the honorable gentleman simply says this: "There is the Land Fund. We must take it." Taking that in conjunction with the statements the honorable gentleman has previously made in this House, I think it must be deemed to bear that meaning.

Sir G. GREY.—As a matter of personal explanation, I wish to say I made no such statement as the honorable member alleges—that I intended to sacrifice the public estate, and to sell large blocks of land, neglecting the interests of other classes. I never made such a statement.

Mr. McLEAN.—I only make reasonable deductions from what the honorable gentleman said. I think there are a great number of members—at any rate, there are on this side—who, looking at the votes the honorable gentleman has given even during this session, agree with me in the deductions I have made; and I dare say there are some on the other side. Although I am quite prepared to accept the honorable gentleman's denial, still I say I made but a reasonable deduction from his statement, which some day will be realized. The honorable gentleman pleaded for time in order that he might put the finances of the colony in a simple condition, which, he said, my late colleague, the late Colonial Treasurer, had admitted he had failed to do. I deny that my honorable friend failed or said he had failed to do that. On the contrary, if you look at the state of the finances of the colony as they were when my honorable friend the honorable member for Egmont took office and the state in which they now are, it will be seen that the reverse is the case. The finances of the colony are becoming plain; and when the old provincial accounts are wound up, which will be done in another year, the accounts of the colony will be such that any man of ordinary capacity may easily understand them. The Premier pleaded for a little time; but how was the vote which put him in office carried? By a number of our supporters being deluded by his party. They got the honorable member for the Thames to declare that he would stand out of the way and allow others to assume the reins of government. At the very first meeting after the Colonial Treasurer was intrusted with the formation of a Government, he informed those present that he had the authority of the honorable member for stating that he had no desire to stand in the way; whereupon an extreme supporter of the honorable gentleman got up and declared—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I hope the honorable gentleman will confine his remarks as much as possible to the question before the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am endeavouring to show that those honorable gentlemen got on to those benches in a manner which does not entitle them to the confidence of this House. What I wished to say was, that a strong supporter of the honorable gentleman got up and said that he had the honorable gentleman's authority for stating that he had every intention to take office. And what was the result? A number of gentlemen who had been deluded got up and walked out of the room, and declined to have any more to do with the meeting.

Mr. REES.—More shame for them.

Mr. McLEAN.—It was to their credit. When honorable gentlemen endeavour to obtain seats on the Ministerial benches by such unfair means, it was creditable to those gentlemen to walk out of the room. Had the honorable gentlemen who seceded from us taken up the reins of government, as I believed they would do, I would have used my influence with my own party to leave them in power this year. I have stated that over and over again, and I would have done it; but the gentlemen now in power shall not remain on the Government benches if I can help it. If they had got there by fair constitutional means I should have offered no objection; but, looking at the manner in which they were placed on those seats, I shall feel quite justified in assisting to eject them, although I will never be connected with any party like the former Opposition, who, purely by the strength of tongue, have delayed the business of this House for months. From the beginning of the session, the plan of action of those gentlemen was to talk against time, and abuse the Bills of the late Government; but no sooner do they get on the Ministerial benches than they stand up manfully for them, and declare them to be the best-drawn Bills they ever saw. They give them their unqualified support. They have not brought down a single measure of their own. They were only too glad to accept the Bills of the late Government. And then it is said that they carried those Bills through the House so easily. That is not at all difficult of explanation. The late Government, convinced that the Bills had been framed in the interests of the country at large, loyally assisted in carrying them through; but the late Opposition, who objected to them very strongly at first, supported them warmly when the positions became reversed. The honorable gentleman at the head of the Government said that we had plundered Otago and Canterbury of their Land Fund, and said that he would be no party to such a thing. Why, Sir, every year the honorable member has advocated the seizure of the whole of the Land Fund—this very session he voted for making the whole of it colonial revenue; but when he takes his seat on the Government benches he declares that he will not be a party to plundering the Land Fund. What consistency is there in that? Why, Sir, every act of the honorable gentleman in connection with this subject has been in the same direction. Then we come to the Native question. The honorable gentleman, in one of his speeches, said, "If we were in power, do you think prisoners would be released by force, and murderers be allowed to remain at large?" I believe his colleague the Native Minister has endeavoured to settle the Oamaru difficulty, and has failed—a case near the Town of Napier where the Natives have set the Supreme Court at defiance.

Sir G. GREY.—May I ask for an explanation? I never before heard of the place the honorable gentleman describes.

Mr. McLEAN.—The name may be wrong—I do not profess to be a Maori scholar; but the honorable gentleman knows perfectly well what place I mean. It was where the Natives obstructed the execution of a Supreme Court writ. However, the Native Minister failed to settle that matter before he was a member of the Government, and I very much doubt if, were he there, he would succeed now. Then there is a case where goods were taken out of a store up in the North by some Maoris, and when they were remonstrated with they said, "There is no law now; Sir George Grey is in power." They evidently think that as long as Sir George Grey is in power they can do as they like. Then, as to a Maori prisoner being released from a coach at Opanaki. Would the honorable gentleman have instructed the police to recapture that man at once? I am sure he would not. If he had done so he would have brought about very serious consequences. It is absurd to say that we wished to precipitate a war with the Natives. We always tried to avoid such an unfortunate result. The proper course, in our opinion, was to adopt peaceable measures, in the belief that these prisoners would eventually be given up. The honorable gentleman also referred to Winiata's case. Now, he knows perfectly well that every exertion was made by the Government to capture that man. Every step was taken that possibly could be taken, and if Winiata was not secured it was not from want of energy and a desire to see that the ends of justice were met. The Government displayed no apathy in the matter, and it was no reproach to them that Winiata was not secured. I have no doubt in my own mind that the Natives of the King country will in time give him up to justice; but I do not believe that Native difficulties will disappear so long as the honorable gentleman and his colleagues remain on those benches. My own belief is that, instead of disappearing, they will increase. Why, Sir, what is the result of the agitation created in Hawke's Bay? Petitions from the Maoris of that district, endeavouring to upset deeds that have been in existence for twenty or thirty years, are now before the Native Affairs Committee. Did they ever think of repudiating those deeds before? Certainly not. These petitioners themselves stated that thirty years ago they walked over the boundary with Sir Donald McLean, and all the land within that boundary did not belong to the Government. The honorable member for Auckland City East laughs at this, for no better reason than that I can see except, as he said himself, "The loud laugh proclaims the vacant mind." That is one case, and I say that it is a case in which the deed was only twenty-three years old, and the Natives did not dispute it until the Repudiation party was formed in Hawke's Bay. This House has been literally deluged with Maori claims ever since the Repudiation party came into existence. I should like to know when these claims are to be settled. If the Petitions Committee decide that all these claims shall be settled, I pity poor New Zealand, for if ever any country in the world has been saddled with such claims it is unfortunate New Zealand. A very large sum out of the millions which we have borrowed would be required to wipe out the claims New Zealand has been compelled to pay. Sir, the honorable member for Auckland City East has said a good deal about a dissolution. Now, Sir, I heard some honorable gentlemen who were in the previous Parliament twitting each other, and saying that they would never come back to the House; but I find that those members who talked most loudly in that respect are now missing from Parliament. Let me tell honorable members of this House that if matters go on as they are now going on it will be very difficult to get good and proper men to come to this House at all. I regret to say that, since these discussions have been going on in this House during the last few months, I have heard good men declare that they would not come back to this House on any consideration. I should regret to see any good man put out of the House, no matter whether he agreed with me in politics or not. At elections, I have supported good men whose political views were opposite to my own simply because they were good men, and because I thought that when they came into this House they would do that which was right and good. The only fear I have is that, in case there should be a dissolution, some of the good men in the House will not seek to return. It may be that some honorable members would not be returned. We all know that in an election no man can make certain of being returned, no matter how popular he may be. A turn of the tide may take place, and any member of this House may be rejected. It is not discreditable to a man to be defeated at an election. Every man has to take his chance. I do not care to say that any honorable member on the other side of the House will not come back—I shall be very glad to see every able man returned, no matter on which side of the House he may be. The honorable member at the head of the Government has said that he wishes to see the whole colony grasped in the hand of one strong Government. Well, if I had thought that we were going in for centralization, I for one would have been a bitter opponent of Abolition. I believed in doing away with the provinces, because they were financially killing the country, because they were made machines for raising money, while the people of the colony did not know how that money was spent. My object in doing away with the provinces was that we might create counties in their place, and gradually, as they got into working order, that their powers might be increased, giving them the power of raising, by taxation, as much money as they absolutely required. If our scheme had been properly carried out we should have been decentralizing, and not centralizing. If you give the ratepayers the control of the public money the country will not be landed in debt, as it has been under the provincial system. If the counties have to raise the money they require the people in each county will keep a sharp look-out over the expenditure. I will now say a few words regarding the honorable member for Akaroa. That honorable gentleman evidently had a very good speech ready for delivery on the last vote of want of confidence which was moved. The honorable gentleman did not deliver it at that time, but he made it serve for the present motion. In fact, he turned it round to suit the present motion. It was amusing to see how well he turned the speech round into one of no confidence in the Opposition. I am afraid that I have wearied the House, but I have endeavoured to show that the present Colonial Treasurer of the colony completely misstated our finances. I state, and I pledge myself to it, that, whatever the honorable gentleman may say to the contrary, the Financial Statement presented by the late Colonial Treasurer is absolutely correct. I say that while the late Government were in power they never made an appointment and they never did anything else for the purpose of buying support. In the last division even the construction of a bridge in some cases would have obtained a vote for the Government, and we could have promised such things if we had wished to remain in office.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I rise to a point of order, Sir. The honorable gentleman is maligning this House. He says that if the late Government had promised a member of this House that a bridge should be constructed in his district it could have gained a vote.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is certainly not a statement that should be made.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not wish to make any statement that will affect honorable members, and therefore I will withdraw what I have said. But I will make this statement: that the late Government never did anything of which they should be ashamed. They never did anything that was improper; and I dare the present Government to search in any of the offices over which the late Government had control for anything that would tell in any way against them. I say that, if the honorable gentlemen who compose the present Ministry leave those benches as clean and as clear as the late Government did, it will be creditable to them. We have been told that claims can easily be settled now, but we know that matters can be settled easily and yet wrongly, and we wish to settle matters properly when we settle them at all. I have no desire to take up the time of the House any further. I have simply to move the amendment which I have read.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question is, That the words proposed to be added be so added.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I do not think these words can be added to my amendment.

Mr. O'RORKE.—I wish to address you, Sir, on a point of order: not with the view of swaying your opinion, but in order that the House, before it embarks on another debate, should consider temperately whether we are acting consistently with our Standing Orders and with Parliamentary practice in debating the proposed amendment. Standing Order No. 100 says, "No question or amendment may be proposed which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative." This House has already resolved that it will not allow such words as these—"this House has no confidence in the Government"—to stand part of the question. The proposed amendment is for the addition of the words, "But this House expresses its opinion that, as the Government has not a majority, it should immediately resign." It appears to me that the proposition now made is exactly to reinstate the substance of the rejected words, and is in opposition to Parliamentary practice. The commentary of May on the rule which I have quoted is as follows—at page 298:—

"It is the rule, in both Houses, not to permit any question or Bill to be offered which is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session. This is necessary in order to avoid contradictory decisions, to prevent surprises, and to afford proper opportunities for determining the several questions as they arise. If the same question could be proposed again and again, a session would have no end, or only one question could be determined; and it would be resolved first in the affirmative, and then in the negative, according to the accidents to which all voting is liable."

The author then, in describing the attempts at evading this rule, adds,—

"A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object, will not be sufficient to evade this rule. On the 7th July, 1840, Mr. Speaker called attention to a motion for a Bill to relieve Dissenters from the payment of church rates, before he proposed the question from the chair. Its form and words were different from those of a previous motion, but its object was substantially the same; and the House agreed that it was irregular, and ought not to be proposed from the chair."

I contend that in this instance there is not a sufficient variance between the proposed amendment and the words that have been rejected to constitute a new question, but that they are substantially the same. I think, before the question is proposed from the chair, honorable members who entertain opinions on this subject should be allowed to express them before a final decision is given by yourself or by the House. This is a matter worthy of consideration. The adherence to our Standing Orders and to Parliamentary practice is a matter which affects the interests of both parties—the setting them at defiance can rebound to the credit of neither; and, whilst I do not conceal my opinion on the subject, I trust I have expressed it with that temperance which the gravity of the occasion requires; and I invite other honourable members to discuss the point of order apart from mere party feelings, and with a desire to uphold the rules of Parliament.

Mr. REID.—I presume I shall be in order in speaking to the point raised. This is a different question from any other question that comes before Parliament, and there are other rules that apply solely to such questions—namely, that on a motion of want of confidence an honorable member is entitled to speak, although it is against the Standing Orders, on any question that has arisen during the whole session, and during the whole administration of the Government. I think you will also find this to be the case: that a vote of no confidence in the Government may be moved and carried more than once during the same session of Parliament. In the second place, I would point out that the words proposed to be added to the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers do not affect the question that has been already decided. The question already decided is a question of confidence or no confidence. The words proposed to be added affirm that the Government have not a majority of the House; that, in fact, they are in a minority. I am speaking of the language of the resolution, and not of its meaning. There is a wide distinction between the amendment which has been before the House—that we are not to deal with this no-confidence question until the Government have declared their policy—there is a great distinction between that and affirming that the Government, not having a majority, should not continue to sit on those benches. I appeal to the good sense of every honorable member whether the Government, not having a majority, should not consider it their duty to resign at once. It is entirely against the practice of Parliament not to do so.

Mr. REES.—No.

Mr. REID.—It is impossible that the business of Parliament can be carried on, the Government not having a majority. If that is so, and I think it is so—notwithstanding that the honorable member for Auckland City East laughs—it is clearly desirable that the fact should be known. In my view, the motion just proposed does not conflict with the question that has already been dealt with by the House.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—The honorable member has made a broad assertion. He takes it for granted that the Government have not a majority. The late division shows that they have a majority. The same state of affairs will again occur, and they will again have a majority. I say that the honorable gentleman, in moving this amendment, is begging the whole question. He moves that the Government, not having a majority, should resign; whereas the fact is they have a majority. They have a majority with your casting vote. Last year the Government had only your casting vote, and yet they remained in office the whole session; they were kept in by your casting vote.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—They say "No." What nonsense! Am I to be called upon to go and bring the volume of Hansard to prove that a direct vote, which was accepted by the Ministry as a vote of want of confidence, was only carried by your casting vote, and that they remained in office? I am not going to take the trouble. The fact is that this is so.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I have made a distinct statement, and honorable members continue to deny its accuracy. The statement I have made is a statement of fact, and I ask your ruling, Sir, whether it is possible for honorable members to speak on a point of order when they have the lie direct given to them.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The rule is very obvious, and it is known to honorable members—namely, that when an honorable member makes a distinct statement it is wrong on the part of honorable members not to accept it.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Thank you, Sir: that is a true ruling, no doubt. Last year the Ministry only lived by your casting vote, and yet they remained in office all the session.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is desirable that honorable members should confine themselves to arguing the point of order raised.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I am following the honorable member for Taieri, who has especially referred to the point that the present Ministry are not in a majority. I think you will allow me to refer to that.

Mr. REID.—I said that they had not a majority.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—It is put in this motion as a fact, and I say it is not a fact. The motion is wrong as at present framed. That is the point of order which has been raised. I do not think the honorable gentleman has any right to put the motion. I do not think the Government would much mind its being debated; but it states as a matter of fact that which is not a matter of fact. It purports that the Government have not a majority, whereas the fact of their existence proves that they are in the majority.

Mr. STOUT.—Speaking to a point of order only, I say that the proposed amendment is inadmissible on two grounds. The first of these has been mentioned by the honorable member for Onehunga—namely, that this motion would contest the very point upon which a decision has already been given. The other objection is that this proposed amendment is contradictory in its terms to what precedes. You have on all occasions ruled that one cannot add words to an amendment which would make the previous part contradictory in its terms. That is the effect this motion would have. On the first ground I could give you several examples in which it has been held that the rule cannot be evaded in the way the honorable member for the Taieri points out. I quote from May, sixth edition, page 285, where this occurs: "A mere alteration of the words of a question without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade this rule." Then he goes on to give two specific examples. The first example is,— "On the 7th July, 1840, Mr. Speaker called attention to a motion for a Bill to relieve Dissenters from the payment of church rates, before he proposed the question from the chair. Its form and words were different from those of a previous motion, but its object was substantially the same; and the House agreed that it was irregular, and ought not to be proposed from the chair."

Then there is still another example given:—

"On the 15th of May, 1860, the order for the second reading of the Charity Trustees Bill was withdrawn, as it was discovered to be substantially the same as the Endowed Schools Bill, which the House had already put off for six months."

Then there is also a special example given as to the appointment of a member of the House a member of a Committee:—

"On 18th July an amendment was proposed to a question by leaving out all the words after 'That,' in order to add 'Thomas Slingsby Duncombe, Esq., be added to the Committee of Secrecy on the Post Office;' but Mr. Speaker stated that on the 2nd July a motion had been made 'That Mr. Duncombe be one other member of the said Committee,' that the question had been negatived, and that he considered it was 'contrary to the usage and practice of the House that a question which had passed in the negative should be again proposed in the same session.' The amendment was consequently withdrawn."

I have shown that the alteration of words or the alteration of form will not matter if the substance is the same; and I submit, therefore, that, as the amendment is the same in substance as the original resolution, the amendment is out of order.

Mr. REES.—Not only are the text-books perfectly clear and distinct upon the point, but the authorities of the House of Commons are so also. The case quoted by the honorable member for Onehunga is reported in 195, Commons Journals, page 495, where it is laid down as follows:—

"A motion having been made and seconded, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to relieve Dissenters from the Established Church of England from the payment of church rates;

"Mr. Speaker called the attention of the House to the proceedings of the House on Monday, the 11th day of February last. The House was moved, That the entry in the Journal of the House of the 11th day of February last, upon a motion relative to church rates, might be read; and the same was read as followeth:

"A motion was made, and the question being put, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to relieve from the payment of church rates that portion of Her Majesty's subjects who conscientiously dissent from the rites or doctrines of the Established Church;

"(The House divided.)

"Whereupon Mr. Speaker stated to the House that, in his opinion, the motion now made was in substance the same as that upon which a question having been put had passed in the negative in this present session; and that therefore, according to the rules of the House, it was not competent for him to propose a question upon the motion now made."

Whatever may be the rule, as stated by the honorable member for the Taieri, in relation to motions of want of confidence being put more than once during a session, it does not apply to the present case, because this is a continuation of the same debate; and if the honorable gentleman can move his amendment he can go on bringing down amendment after amendment for the next six months.

Mr. REID.—There will be no room for any other amendment after this one.

Mr. REES.—Then how is there room for this one?

Mr. REID.—The matter will be finally disposed of on this amendment.

Mr. REES.—I am afraid the honorable gentleman will be beaten again, and will have to bring up another. However, I will not argue that now, but will leave my remarks until we are discussing the main question. We were told that if we only came to a vote on the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers we should be beaten; but we have not been beaten, and the principle which the honorable member for the Taieri illustrates by interrupting me shows that his argument is not good, because he says that if his side of the House is successful no further amendment will be required. It follows, then, that if they are not successful another amendment will be required. If you, Sir, rule that such motions can be put because they are in a different form of words, the next thing will be that there will be no necessity for another form of words, and we shall have the same thing repeated the moment a vote of want of confidence is lost by an honorable member getting up and giving a long disquisition upon figures which he does not understand, and then proposing another motion exactly the same as that which has been disposed of. Another case, which is quoted on the same page of May, is reported in 115, Commons Journals, page 249. The rule is clear and distinct. And here, immediately after the House has divided, and when you, Sir, gave your casting vote only half an hour or an hour ago against the resolution of the honorable member for Egmont, we are called upon to go over the very same ground again on the motion of the honorable member for Waikouaiti. I submit, therefore, with great respect to you, Sir, that it is contrary to the rules and practice of Parliament, and that not only is it good to adhere to the rules in this case, but if we get beyond them it is impossible to tell where we shall end. It will come to this: that a party which may absolutely have only a majority of one will be able to override all the rules of the House. If you have any doubt upon the subject—although I do not think it is possible that you can have—I would ask you to look into the cases which have been quoted by the honorable member for Onehunga and the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout).

Mr. BARFF.—It appears to be a very singular line of conduct proposed by the honorable member for the Taieri when he says that, in the event of this amendment being negatived, there would be no room for any other. It occurred to me during the course of the debate that it would be possible, in the event of the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers being lost, to add words to the original resolution; and, for the information of honorable members not aware of the fact, I may say that I proposed in my own mind at one time to alter the original resolution in a certain manner. I proposed to alter it into this form: "That this House has no confidence in the Government recently ejected from the Ministerial benches." That was one amendment which I had in my mind; and another would have read in this way: "That the House has no confidence in the government of the late Ministry." I was prepared with any number of authorities to show that the word "government" would meet the case entirely, and that it did not altogether apply to the gentlemen administering affairs, but to the administration of affairs generally. I submitted these proposed amendments to an honorable gentleman well qualified to give an opinion, and was advised that they would not be strictly in order, although they were both diametrically opposed to the object sought to be obtained by the original resolution. If that rule held good in my case, how much more does it hold good in respect to the amendment endeavoured to be forced on the House, first by the honorable member for Egmont, and, failing him, by the honorable member for Waikouaiti—an amendment which was in the direction of carrying out precisely the same object which was sought to be obtained by the original resolution. The authorities quoted by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) show very distinctly to my mind, and, I believe, to the minds of honorable members generally, that the amendment cannot be put from the chair, on the ground that the object sought to be attained is exactly the same as that proposed in the original resolution. As several honorable members, in speaking to the point of order, referred to other matters, and made certain statements which were not contradicted, I hope that I shall not be considered out of order if I correct what I conceive to be mistakes. It was said, in the course of this discussion on the question of order, that the Government did not remain in office last year on the casting vote of the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is referring to a matter which is not relevant to the question of order.

Mr. BARFF.—I was merely referring to matters which were brought out in the course of this discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member had better not refer to those matters.

Mr. BARFF.—I should not have referred to them but that I thought it necessary to contradict statements which were made, and, as I could quote a particular case, I wished to set honorable members right. The question now resolves itself into this: There is nothing of the original resolution left but the word "That;" and we hear from an honorable member who was recently on the Government benches that nothing can be added to the amendment which is now proposed. I say that that is not the case, and that anything could be added to it but the amendment of the honorable member for Waikouaiti; but I presume, and trust that you, Sir, will give a ruling, that the amendment is not in conformity with the Standing Orders.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to put it to you, Sir, that the proposed amendment is practically a distinct question from that which has already been disposed of, inasmuch as it is more explicit. The original resolution expressed the opinion that the House had no confidence in the Government, but it did not at all follow from that that the House meant the Government to resign. The House might have meant it, or it might not have meant it. (Oh, oh!) That is my opinion. I have no doubt as to what my object was; but I say that many honorable gentlemen might have voted for that resolution under the impression that a dissolution would take place, and the country would have to decide between the two parties. That is a fair inference. There was nothing in it to compel the Government to resign if they were prepared to go to the country, supposing circumstances favoured their taking that course. This amendment, on the other hand, directly calls upon the Government to resign immediately, and I therefore submit that there is a considerable difference between it and the original motion. I submit, also, that it cannot be held that a vote of want of confidence cannot be proposed twice in the same session. It is quite clear that this House has and should always have a right to express its opinion upon the conduct of the Ministry who are conducting the business of the country; and the rules which the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) has quoted do not at all apply to a case of confidence or no confidence. I think the House would be landed in a great difficulty if a want-of-confidence motion cannot be put twice in the one session against the same Government. It might be that a Government in a minority might take an opportunity of getting one of its followers to propose a motion of want of confidence in the absence of some of the majority, and, that being negatived, it could not be put again during the whole session. I think that every facility should be given to the House to ascertain whether the Government possess a working majority or not. As a matter of fact, they do not possess a majority. And it is right that I should say that this morning an honorable gentleman, who is too ill to be in his place in the House, sent down his pair, which was refused by the other side. That, I am informed, is the case, and, had the honorable gentleman known that the pair would be refused, ill as he is he would probably have come down. It is not consistent, under such circumstances, that the Government should occupy its present position. The object of the amendment is to determine who is to conduct the business of the country, and I think it would be a dangerous precedent if we are debarred from ascertaining what is the will of the House upon the question.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I wish to say a few words. The one object of the late motion was to remove these gentlemen from the Government benches. There can be no doubt about that. Such was the object in the mind of the honorable gentleman who moved the motion. Then, if the words of the amendment now before the House are not precisely the same as those of the motion, the object is exactly the same. I submit that it matters not what may be the wording if the object is the same. I think the authorities quoted by the honorable member for Dunedin City are apt, and that this amendment should not be put.

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I do not think the honorable gentleman is right when he says that the Government should resign in consequence of the vote that has been come to. The honorable gentleman should remember that last session a motion upon which the Government of which he was a member staked their existence was only negatived by the casting vote of Mr. Speaker, and yet they did not resign.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The motion was rescinded.

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—And during this session the Public Works Advances Bill, which they regarded as a party measure, was only read a second time by the casting vote of Mr. Speaker, who distinctly said he disapproved of the Bill.

Major Atkinson

Still the House did not ask the Government to resign.

Mr. RICHARDSON.—On the latter occasion to which the honorable gentleman refers Mr. Speaker gave his vote in the way he did in order that the House might further discuss the matter. No doubt his vote to-day was given for the same purpose, but what that could mean, except an amendment of this kind, I am at a loss to know.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Sir, I would simply call your attention to the fact that the precedent which has been mentioned, that of last session, when a motion involving the fate of the Government was only negatived by the casting vote of the Speaker, is not a precedent, because the Government announced that it would resign. Nobody knows that better than I do. The Government had made up its mind to resign, but did not, simply because the House virtually reversed its decision. I remember the Premier coming down to a meeting of his supporters and saying, "I shall resign, unless the decision of the House is reversed." A motion was therefore brought forward in the House to rescind the motion which had been passed; and Hansard will show, and the Minutes of Proceedings of the House will show, that the motion for rescision was agreed to, and that the Ministry remained in office. I think it is impossible to find an instance of a Government in this colony remaining in power when it could not command a majority.

Mr. STOUT.—Mr. Stafford, in 1868.

Mr. WHITAKER.—Now, as to the amendment, I contend it involves a different question altogether from that involved in the motion which has been negatived, and can be put and ought to be put by you, Sir. The matter as it at present stands is in this position: The words, "this House has no confidence in the Government," have been negatived; but I submit to you, Sir, that, although the House may have the fullest confidence in the Government, still a majority might think it proper that the Government should resign under certain circumstances. I hear the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) indulging in coarse laughter, but I think that if he would not laugh so loudly it would be much better. We are not to be beaten by a laugh, nor is a laugh argument. When I wish to answer an argument I get up and speak to the Chair, and do not laugh instead of arguing. I say, although the House may have confidence in the Government, still a majority might be of opinion that under the circumstances the Ministry ought to resign. The two things are perfectly distinct, and I think the amendment should be put to the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON.—I may say, speaking to the point of order, that it is quite clear the Government do not possess a majority in this House, for I was unavoidably absent when the division took place, and had I been present should have voted against them.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I may add that this morning I brought down a pair from the honorable member for Totara, and it was refused, though he was ill and unable to come down.

Mr. STOUT.—I saw Mr. Gisborne to-day, and he was quite well.

Mr. HODGKINSON.—As a private member, awaiting your decision, I should like to say a few words, if I may express an opinion. I have a decided opinion on the matter, unless there is something in reserve of which I know nothing, because I think, if the same rules apply in these cases as we acknowledge apply in other matters coming before the House, the amendment certainly cannot be put. It is actually the same as the motion which has been rejected. If clothed in different words, it is substantially the same, and, this House having already affirmed that Ministers possess the confidence of the House, what possible reason, or what possible consistency, can there be in calling upon them to resign? If they have a majority of the House, that is tantamount to their having the confidence of the House. The argument of the honorable member for the Taieri went to show that the amendment and the motion are substantially the same. Of course, if, then, a new Ministry went into office, I could understand that a motion of want of confidence could be brought against them; but I cannot understand that a vote of want of confidence can again be brought against the same Ministry. The honorable member for Waikato attempted to prove that the motion and the amendment substantially differed, but he did not succeed in showing that there was any difference. I think the words of the amendment are, "the Ministry not having a majority in the House." Surely that is substantially the same as the motion just negatived, because if they have the confidence of the House—which the House has just declared they have—then they must have a majority. That we shall be able to see when Ministers come to carry their measures. That would be the best test as to whether the Government does or does not possess a majority. I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—There is one point, Sir, that has occurred in this debate of which I may be allowed to remind you. There is a very broad distinction between renewing a vote of want of confidence and the putting of a single vote of want of confidence on the same issue twice. That is what is being argued by honorable members on the other side of the House—that the same vote can be put twice. We all know perfectly well that the honorable member for Egmont can at once table a fresh motion of want of confidence in the Government; but he cannot take a vote twice upon the same issue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question has assumed a greater degree of importance on account of the large question involved in the discussion. Nevertheless, I have to interpret to the best of my ability the rules laid down in our Standing Orders, and I hope the House will not think I am rash if I now give my opinion, without taking further time for deliberation. There is, however, one point upon which I shall think it my duty to reserve my opinion, in order that I may give it at a subsequent time, after fuller consideration; but it is, I think, better to give my opinion upon the main point, and the reasons which induce me to come to that opinion. The rule, which is a general and fundamental rule, is that a subject once disposed of cannot be brought up again. Still, attempts are constantly made to vary the language of a motion, which, though varied, is yet the same in substance. But no mere variation of language is sufficient. The House is not to be so deluded. There must be a material alteration in substance. The object must be different. If the object, the material character of the motion, is the same as that of the motion negatived, then the House would refuse to receive it. A light covering thrown over it does not deter the House from recognizing its main form. Applying that rule, I am bound to say that this amendment is identical with the motion upon which the House has already voted. Again, there is another rule to this effect: that, where a motion is proposed to be amended by an addition which revives a question already disposed of, the addition cannot be received. Now, I do think it is contrary, not only to the spirit of the Standing Orders, but to the general rule of Parliament, that such an addition as that proposed by the honorable member for Egmont should be received. The question, as proposed to be amended by the addition of certain words, is this: "That, as the Government have not yet declared their policy, this House declines in the meantime to entertain the question of 'confidence' or 'no confidence' in the Ministry." And this is the proposed addition: "But this House expresses the opinion that, as the Government has not a majority, it should immediately resign." Now, in reality, the question of "confidence" or "no confidence" is a question of resignation or no resignation. The House is called upon to declare that that question shall not be entertained, and in the same breath it is asked, in the proposed addition, to proceed to entertain it. The opinion which I give now is based upon this apparent incongruity; but, at the same time, I regard the point as one of such importance that I shall not finally decide until I resume the chair this evening. There is a good deal in the point raised by the honorable member for Avon that the House is not to be debarred by any cause—there may be a variety of circumstances—from making its mind known in regard to the fitness of the gentlemen on the Ministerial benches to occupy those positions. Then, again, the honorable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Richardson) made some very pointed remarks upon the vote I gave to-day. I may say that that vote was entirely analogous to and consonant with other votes which it has been my duty to give on other similar occasions. I acted upon the well-known rule by which Speakers are guided upon such occasions—that, wherever there is an opportunity to give further and fuller consideration, that opportunity should be given. Although these great fundamental rules are perfectly clear, yet there is no doubt whatever that every Parliament reserves to itself the right, a right which it frequently exercises, to rescind a vote. Especially I am bound to say that if, as might be inferred from some observations I heard this afternoon, a catch-vote has been obtained, the House has always the right to rescind its decision, and that may be done without violating the general rule. Having frankly stated my opinion, I will ask the House to adjourn till half-past seven o'clock, when I will give a definite ruling upon the point raised.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I promised the House, when I left the chair at half-past five o'clock, that I would give my ruling when the House resumed as to whether the words proposed by the honorable member for Egmont could be added to the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I have already given my opinion so far as I could, but I have since given the matter full consideration. I now have to state, with regard to the applicability of the rule, that questions of the same substance and import, having once been decided, cannot be brought up again during the same session—that there can be no doubt whatever the rule applies to this case. The amendment is opposed to the original motion in words, though the substance is the same. It is repugnant to the very motion on which it is proposed to be an amendment by way of addition. I have carefully considered how far the rule to which I have referred applied universally, and what exceptions would affect the position of Ministers in this House, and the declaration of this House of its opinion in respect of them. That is a very serious matter, and the honorable member for Christchurch drew my attention particularly to the observations I made on giving my casting vote. He asked how far the ruling I gave was consistent with such a decision, and if, in reality, this rule was a bar to a second or third motion of want of confidence in the Ministry being moved during the same session. I am clearly of opinion that this rule does not apply to such a case, for this reason: that, although the form of words may not be the same—and I think it desirable always to vary the words—the substance is different, inasmuch as a Government may vary in its policy and measures during a session; and consequently a vote of want of confidence may be repeated.

Question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be there inserted," negatived.

MUNICIPAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SHARP asked the Government, If they will procure and lay before this House a return of the number of officers employed by the various Municipalities of the colony; the amount of salary of each officer; and the amount of travelling allowances or other expenses paid to such officers?

Sir G. GREY said the return asked for by the honorable gentleman would be ready in a few days, when it would be laid before the House.

MRS. McMANUS.

Mr. BURNS asked the Minister of Justice, Whether Messrs. Daldy, Isaacs, and O'Neill have made any reparation to Mrs. McManus for their illegal conduct towards her son, as recommended by the Public Petitions Committee in the report laid before the House on the 17th August last; and, if reparation has not yet been made, whether His Excellency the Governor will be advised to strike the names of Messrs. Daldy, Isaacs, and O'Neill off the list of Justices of the Peace for the colony, as further recommended by the Public Petitions Committee?

Mr. SHEEHAN said he had made inquiries regarding this matter, and Messrs. Daldy and Isaacs had sent telegraphic replies to the questions that were put to them. Both gentlemen justified their action. Mr. Daldy resigned his position as a Justice of the Peace, and Mr. Isaacs said he had done nothing worthy of censure. He (Mr. Sheehan) could not say whether Mr. Isaacs should be struck off the roll of Justices of the Peace or not until he had made further inquiries; but he would take into consideration the facts brought out by the Public Petitions Committee, and, if he found that the allegations made were true, he would be prepared to recommend His Excellency the Governor accordingly.

Mr. BURNS wished to know whether any reparation whatever had been made to Mrs. McManus.

Mr. SHEEHAN replied in the negative.

TIMARU BOARD OF WORKS.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Government, (1.) If they will lay before this House copies of all correspondence relating to the purchase by the Government of the Board of Works building at Timaru? (2.) If they propose to place a sum on the Estimates to provide for the payment of the money agreed to be paid for the building six months ago? (3.) Whether they will allow interest for the time that the payment has been withheld? He wished to be allowed to make a few remarks in explanation of this question. Some time last year the Timaru and Gladstone Board of Works then in existence offered to the Government the building in which they had been carrying on their business. He believed they had received an offer from a contractor for that building for the sum of £3,000, which was about what it was worth according to valuation. They offered it to the Government for that sum, and their offer was accepted. The Board of Works declined to hand over the building to a public department of the Government until the money was paid. They received from the late Colonial Treasurer, or one of his subordinates, a telegram saying that a voucher had passed to them for the amount, and requesting them to hand over the building to Judge Ward, or some other public officer. The Board gave up possession of the building, and shortly afterwards they telegraphed that they had not received any of the purchase-money, and asked where it was. They received a reply that it would be necessary to get an Act passed. It looked like deception on the part of the late Government, but he trusted it was not so, but that it was a mere blunder. The Government had been occupying the building ever since, although the Board could have received at once from the other party a cheque for the money. Frequent applications had been made for it by the Board, by himself, and by the honorable member representing the district, but the Board had never been able to get a half-penny. He put the question in order to elicit a distinct answer from the Government, whether they were going to pay for the building, which had been occupied for some time.

Mr. LARNACH replied that the information required would be ready in a few days, when he would be prepared to state what would be done in relation to this building.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Premier, When the Government will introduce the Bill to reduce Ministers' salaries, and arrange as to the disposal of Ministerial residences?

Sir G. GREY replied that the Government would introduce a Bill on the subject, and endeavour to have it passed through the House.

MARINE ENGINEER.

Mr. STAFFORD asked the Commissioner of Customs, Whether, in view of the large number of harbour works in course of construction and proposed, the Government will take steps to appoint a competent marine engineer, who would inspect and report on all harbour works in course of construction and proposed to be constructed, and who could act as Consulting Engineer to all Harbour Boards in New Zealand?

Sir G. GREY said the question asked was a very important one. He could merely tell the honorable gentleman that the matter had engaged the attention of the Government, and he hoped shortly to be able to inform the House what course the Government proposed to take on the subject.

J. HUME.

Mr. BEETHAM asked the Native Minister, What action the Government propose to take to carry out the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee on the petition of J. Hume and others? This question related to a most important matter. A great many of the settlers in the Lower Wairarapa had yearly suffered very serious loss in consequence of the water covering their land. The Committee had made a report, and recommended the Government to take action on this matter immediately. It seemed to be a disputed question between the Natives. Some of the Natives had disposed of their rights, and others affirmed they had not. The Native Affairs Committee recommended that the Government should make some inquiry into this matter as soon as possible, in order to prevent the loss which the settlers were now suffering.

Mr. SHEEHAN said this matter had been before the House for several years. It had come before the Native Affairs Committee on two occasions, and reports had been made by them, with respect to the Native rights in the Wairarapa Lake, in favour of the Maori people. He could promise the honorable gentleman that a settlement would soon be come to that would be satisfactory both to the Natives and to the Europeans in the Lower Wairarapa.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FOX.—Before proceeding to the Orders of the day, I should like to have permission to put a question to the Government without notice—a question which, I am sure, the Government will recognize I put in entire good faith, and upon which, I think, it is desirable the House should receive further information without delay. The House will recollect that last evening the debate on the motion of the honorable member for Egmont and the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers was adjourned upon the motion of the honorable member at the head of the Government for the express purpose of enabling the Government to consider its position in reference to the reply which had been sent to this House by His Excellency to the letter which you, Sir, addressed to His Excellency covering the resolution of the House on the question of privilege. It took a good many honorable members on this side of the House by surprise this morning when, instead of receiving some announcement as to the position of the Government and His Excellency in reference to this question, and, I may say, receiving that reply which His Excellency had promised after consulting his Advisers, other business was proceeded with. That we did not expect; and all I ask now is whether the honorable member at the head of the Government will inform the House whether any communications have taken place between His Excellency and the Government, and whether His Excellency is prepared to give that reply which he intimated he would do, or, if not, when the House is likely to be favoured with it.

Sir G. GREY.—I think that the honorable gentleman who has asked the question has put into my mouth words which I did not use—namely, “the position of the Government.” I remarked last night that the honorable member used that expression himself, but I never used it. It is now my duty at once to tell the House that communications have passed between His Excellency and his Ministerial Advisers, upon the subject to which the honorable gentleman has alluded; and that, as soon as it is in my power to announce to the House that those communications are closed, I will communicate the result. That is all I am prepared to say at present.

DISQUALIFICATION BILL.

Mr. KELLY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it would be generally admitted that the existing Disqualification Act was of a most unsatisfactory character. One of the chief points which proved the defective nature of its provisions was the provision with regard to persons said to be contractors under the Government. The provision with regard to contractors was supposed to be that, when a person became a contractor under the Government during the time that he was a member, his seat by that fact became vacant. It was found, however, when the question was tried, that the clause which was said to be framed with such care, and had so many watchful eyes over it, broke down at the time when it should have been most effective. The Act was called "An Act for better securing the Freedom and Independence of Parliament," as if the freedom and independence of Parliament had been in danger, and the Act was brought in to secure them. How, then, did it set about accomplishing that object? It first provided that no person holding an office under the Crown to which any salary, fee, wages, or emoluments of any kind are attached could be elected to the House of Representatives or be nominated to the Legislative Council while holding such office, and that, if he held such office, his election should be void. Then it went on to say that this provision should only apply to a certain number of persons. Ministers of the Crown, and certain other persons, were declared to be exempt from that part of the Act. It also provided that no person who ceased to be a member of either House should hold office under the Crown for twelve months after his ceasing to be a member; but there were exemptions from this provision Ministers, the Speakers of the two Houses, and all late Superintendents and members of Provincial Executives. That, to his mind, was not a very satisfactory provision. The Bill he brought in was of a very simple character. It merely provided that persons who accepted office under the Crown, or held such offices, could not be elected or nominated to the two Houses respectively, and, if they accepted such offices afterwards, their seats became vacant. It next provided that no contractor under the Government could be elected or nominated, and, if he afterwards accepted a contract, he would cease to be a member. The Bill also provided that the House and the Council should judge when a seat was vacant. He was aware that this point was open to debate. At present action could be taken in the Supreme Court, and the Houses also had power to take action. He thought such cases ought to be settled either by the Houses or by the Supreme Court. He provided in his Bill that the House or Council should respectively declare when a seat was vacated, but if any honorable member moved, as an amendment, that the matter should be determined by the Supreme Court, he would not object. These were the principal provisions of the Bill of which he now moved the second reading.

TARANAKI COUNTY RESERVES BILL.

Mr. KELLY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it had been introduced in order to give effect to the recommendations of the Public Petitions Committee in relation to the petitions of David Anderson and the Taranaki County Council. The reserves mentioned in the First Schedule had been vested in the Superintendent, and were, on the recommendation of the Committee, to be vested in the County Council in trust for the improvement of a certain road in the county. Then there were other lands described in the Second Schedule which had been selected by the Titanio Steel and Iron Company; but that Company had not fulfilled the condition under which it held the land. The Company petitioned the House that the land be granted to them; and the Public Petitions Committee recommended that, if the Company smelted a certain amount of iron from the Taranaki iron-sand within a time to be fixed by the Government, the land should be granted. The County Council prayed, as the Iron-sand Company had forfeited the land, that it should be vested in the County Council for the same purpose as the other lands mentioned in the Bill; but the Petitions Committee considered that the time had not arrived to take this step absolutely. The clause in the Bill dealing with the Iron-sand Company's land was of a contingent character, and was simply intended to achieve this: that, if the Company did not fulfil the conditions, then the land fell back into the hands of the County Council.

Mr. SHEEHAN said he should not object to the Bill, but he hoped it would not be committed till Thursday. He assumed that the Bill did not propose to divert the land from the original trusts. With regard to clause 4, he knew of no objection to the proposed reversion of the lands if the Company failed to carry out its objects; but if the honorable member would adjourn the committal of the Bill till Thursday he (Mr. Sheehan) would be able to tell how far the Government would support him.

Mr. STOUT hoped that the Government would not allow any one to deal with the land until the Company's term was up. The Company had spent many thousands of pounds, and he knew of his own knowledge that many people would not have taken shares if they had not believed that the land in question was secured to them; and it would be unfair of the Government and unfair of the House to allow the whole money to be swept away, and all the lands to be given to the County Council. If that were done, the result would be to damp all enterprise in the future. He did not oppose the second reading of the Bill; but, unless the 2nd clause were struck out, he should oppose it altogether. It was improper to mix up the County Council in the matter.

Mr. REID said he quite agreed with the honorable member who had just addressed the House. If the Company had failed to comply with the conditions it had only done so in a technical sense. No doubt the Government was in a difficulty, but, in case the conditions could not be fulfilled within the time stipulated, he should like to see legislation, if necessary, in order to enable the Government to give the land. The Company, he believed, was quite willing to fulfil the conditions.

Mr. TRAVERS said he had, in consequence of communications he had had with the Chairman of Directors, and with their consent, placed the notice of motion standing in his name on the Order Paper, in reference to the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of David Anderson. The Company were perfectly willing to give up all claim to the land, on being relieved of all liability as to performance of conditions, if the Crown paid them £1,250, which they had paid on account of it. The Company was perfectly willing to accept that, and he thought a provision to that effect might be introduced into the 4th clause.

Mr. KELLY said clause 2 did not take away any rights which the Company at present possessed, but simply provided that, if the Company did not fulfil the conditions, then the County Council got the land on which it had a claim.

KAKANUI HARBOUR BILL.

Mr. SHRIMSKI, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was similar to a measure that was introduced last year to carry out the same object. The only alteration was an increase in the amount of land to be set aside from 6,000 acres to 8,000 acres.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said this was only one of a class of Bills which were being passed through the House to provide endowments for various harbours throughout the colony. It might be in the recollection of the House that last year he endeavoured to obtain an endowment for a harbour in his district, but that proposal was scouted. He would not like to apply the term he might apply to the system which allowed Bills of this character to pass without opposition or remark in the case of certain honorable members, while they were violently opposed in the case of others. He was astonished that a Bill of this nature, raising such a large question, should be allowed to go to its second reading without being questioned. The only remark made by the honorable gentleman who moved the second reading was that the Bill differed slightly from the one introduced last year. If he (Sir R. Douglas) had endeavoured to get a land endowment for a harbour in his district, where public works were sadly required, would it have been passed in this way? He ventured to say, after the treatment he received last session, that it would not. The harbours north of Auckland had not had one penny spent upon them. He had on many occasions tried to get assistance, but had failed; and he therefore felt himself justified in protesting against this Bill. There ought to be one Harbour Act for the whole colony. The colony should take these large colonial works into its own hands, and the Government should see that no more land was set aside for harbour purposes than was absolutely required. His own belief was that the land of the colony should be reserved for the people to settle upon. Let them buy the land, and then they could be taxed to raise whatever sums might be necessary for the improvement of harbours. He objected to the setting aside of large reserves in some districts, while other poorer districts were left without reserves. How did the Government expect to get New Zealand settled under such a system as that? If the system were continued the country would never be settled. He objected to the passing of such Bills. Whilst the South Island was vastly endowed, and its people were becoming richer every day, there were people in the North who found it impossible to get a single thing done in the shape of public works. The sons of settlers were growing grey, and were now as far as ever from obtaining that consideration which they ought to receive; and why? Simply because the land was being set aside as reserves for the benefit of another portion of the colony. The system was radically wrong, and the Government should take the matter into its own hands, provide one general Harbour Bill for the colony, and devise a system of raising moneys sufficient to keep those harbours open, without making special reserves for them.

Mr. SHEEHAN said the honorable member for Maraden spoke under a feeling of irritation which he hardly thought was caused by the appearance of the quiet little Bill under discussion. He told them that when he brought forward a similar proposal it was not listened to; but the House would remember that the honorable gentleman wanted to set aside the whole of the North of Auckland. Why did not the honorable gentleman take the advice given him by the honorable member for Waikato, and bring in specific Bills for specific harbours? Then, no doubt, he would have received from the Government the same amount of support which they gave to other similar proposals. The honorable gentleman said that if he brought forward a Bill of this kind it would not be assented to. His assertion was made altogether regardless of facts. If he brought forward a Bill to deal with the particular harbour, he would get the same justice that the honorable member for Waikato got. When the honorable gentleman brought forward his motion, he (Mr. Sheehan) told him it was pure bunkum—that he might as well have taken in the whole of the South Island and the Chatham Islands as well. The honorable gentleman was very indignant because his proposal to set aside endowments for harbours north of Auckland was not agreed to; and what did he say now? That no reserves for harbours should be made, and that the colony should provide funds for the management of all the harbours. If that were so, why did he bring forward his Bill at all? The honorable gentleman seemed to forget what he had said on previous occasions. As far as he (Mr. Sheehan) was concerned, if the honorable gentleman would bring forward any specific case in his district, and show that there was a fair claim, he would have the same support from the Government which every other honorable member would get, entirely apart from the question whether he was a supporter of theirs or not.

Mr. WAKEFIELD thought that the Native Minister had been rather hard upon the honorable and gallant baronet. He did not think the honorable gentleman meant to raise the question which was raised a few days previously. He simply said this was one of a class of Bills which would localize a great part of the land revenue of the Middle Island. He sympathized with him to a very large extent, and he went entirely with his honorable friend the Native Minister in saying that, if the honorable gentleman had brought down a Bill to localize a defined tract of waste land for a defined purpose, it would have been the duty of the House, in accordance with the line it had taken up this session, to pass his Bill. He would have voted for it, and he felt sure his honorable friend the Native Minister would have voted for it also. But he did not think the fact that neither the honorable and gallant baronet, nor any other member from his part of the country, had chosen to bring down a Bill of the kind, was any reason why this Bill should not pass. He happened to know something about this Kakanui Harbour, and, if he might be allowed briefly to state to the House the facts connected with it, he thought it would pass the Bill without dispute. The Kakanui Harbour works were constructed out of provincial funds. The proposal to make the harbour was ridiculed from the very beginning, but the harbour was a grand success. It was said at first that the scheme was impracticable, and that it would cost hundreds of thousands of pounds; but steamers were now running every day between Kakanui and Dunedin. He had been to Kakanui, and he was satisfied of the success of the harbour. It was an undoubted success, and was the pioneer of a system of harbour construction on the river lagoons in the Middle Island the value of which it was impossible at that moment to estimate. He hoped the arguments of the honorable and gallant baronet, which were right in the main, would not be allowed to interfere with this Bill. If the question came up in such a form as had been indicated by the honorable and gallant baronet, he would assist him to the utmost in getting such a system applied to the North Island as they were endeavouring to apply in a moderate form to the Middle Island.

Mr. ROWE said that if the honorable member for Geraldine considered the different circumstances in which the North Island and the South Island were placed he would go a little further, and say, "If you have not land to set apart for making harbours, I will assist you to get the money to make them out of the Consolidated Fund." He would not oppose the Bill. He approved of it, because he approved of the principle that land should be set aside for these purposes. He hoped when that was being done his honorable friends who represented the Southern Island in that House would remember that the North Island had no land to set aside as endowments for such a purpose. The improvements which were required to be made in the harbours of the North Island were quite as imperative as in the case of the harbour to which this Bill referred. It was useless to ask for endowments, because the land was not there; but he trusted that, while he assisted his southern friends to get such Bills as this through the House, they would by-and-by, when claims were preferred for the North Island, assist in getting, if not land, at any rate money out of the Consolidated Fund for them, so that each Island might be placed on an equality. He would vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. REES said that, if the honorable member for Marsden were desirous of furthering the hopes which his district had for a long time entertained of having its harbour improved, he would do well this session to bring down some Bill for the purpose of endowing the harbour. He believed there were Government lands in the North Island which could be devoted for the purposes of endowment just as well as the lands which were being used in the South. He felt that the northern harbours should be provided for as well as the southern ones. If the honorable member for Marsden would accept of any assistance from him he would be happy to give it, and he would be prepared to draft a Bill for the purpose of endowing his harbour if the honorable gentleman could show him that there were lands available within any reasonable distance. As he had said, he would undertake to draft a Bill and to assist in passing it through the House, provided that there was any land available. He did not wish the Bill to apply to any particular harbour, but to all in the North Island. He would be very happy to assist in setting aside particular blocks of land for the purpose of improving the harbours in the North Island.

FOREST TREES PLANTING BILL.

Mr. HARPER moved, That Mr. Speaker do leave the chair, in order that the House might go into Committee on this Bill.

Mr. STOUT said he could not agree with this Bill. It simply meant that money should be given to those who had money, because those who went in for forest-planting were generally men who had money. It was proposed to give two acres for every one that was planted, and consequently a man might get double the number of acres of land that he held provided that he planted a few blue-gum trees. He could not support the Bill.

Mr. W. WOOD imagined that the Government had not had sufficient time to consider the Bill, and therefore he would move that it be committed on Thursday next.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said that, as a question of giving so much land as payment for so much work done, it was absurd to offer to give two acres for every one that was planted. There was a great deal of trouble and expense connected with the planting of forests. Perhaps it would suit the honorable member for Dunedin City if planting were stopped altogether. If the idea was to encourage those who had the means to continue planting, they would not be offered very much encouragement if they were only to be given two acres for every one they planted. The planting of trees was beneficial to the whole of the colony. As they all knew, the forests affected the rainfall; and in Canterbury, at any rate, there were many places in which it would be desirable to raise forests for the purpose of attracting rain. The amount of land given appeared to bear no proportion to the work done. If it was for State purposes and for the good of the country in general that trees should be planted, he did not think they should take into consideration the amount of land given. If it was considered by the House not desirable to plant trees as a State matter, then let them give no land at all.

Mr. REID said the carrying out of the measure would depend greatly upon the existing regulations. In regard to the statement of the honorable member for Dunedin City that the land might be planted with blue-gums or poplars, he did not think that would be the case. The land must be planted in accordance with the regulations approved by the Governor in Council. These regulations were now in existence, and in each case the person about to plant would have to obtain the consent of the Governor as to the character of the trees to be planted. He thought that would be a very good safeguard; but he thought the Bill should go further, and provide that the Governor should have power to give his approval as to localities in which the trees should be planted. There were many localities in which the planting of trees might be a public benefit, while there were other localities adjacent to native forests in which the planting of trees would not be beneficial. He thought the honorable member for Dunedin City went too far in objecting to the Bill altogether. There was a general feeling, and a well-grounded feeling, that some amount of plantation was very necessary in this country. The feeling had gone so far that the Assembly had passed a Bill to enable the Government to undertake the planting of State forests. If they adopted this Bill, and if the Governor had the power of determining in what part of the country forests should be planted, they would obtain a far more economical mode of planting the forests, and they would be better conserved, than if the work were undertaken by the Government. Therefore he would be disposed to support the committal of this Bill and the passing of it through Committee. He believed that it provided a most economical and most efficacious way of procuring plantations in the country. He looked upon the system of forest-planting undertaken by the State as one likely to lead to very great expense, and there would be great difficulty in conserving the forests without very great expense to the country. He did not say that the existing regulations were all that were required—they might be amended very considerably; but that was a matter of detail, which could be considered by the Government.

Mr. REES thought it would be wise to agree to the adjournment, inasmuch as the Minister for Lands was not able to be present, and had not had an opportunity of speaking upon the Bill. It did not go to the principle of forest-planting: it went merely to the question of the land to be granted; and therefore he thought the Minister for Lands ought to be present. No time would be lost by adjourning the committal of the Bill until Thursday next.

Mr. BOWEN thought it would be a pity to put off the committal of the Bill at this period of the session. The argument of the honorable member for Dunedin City was to the effect that it was a waste of the public estate to give two acres of land for one that was planted, whereas the honorable member for Auckland City East said very truly that this Bill did not affect the principle of the law so far as regarded the amount of land to be given for every acre planted, but only encouraged the planting of larger areas. Those who took an interest in the question of planting knew very well that the law was not wanted to encourage merely ornamental bits of planting. They were chiefly an advantage to the persons who planted them; and yet a certain area of land was given, by the old Bill, to the person who might plant a very small amount of land. The great object to be obtained was to encourage such plantations as would really have an effect upon the whole country-side. Wherever the provisions of the Act had been put in force, he could venture to say that it had been found beneficial in every case. He never heard of a case in which any one had objected to land being obtained by those who were putting in plantations. He had heard a great many people complain that the Act did not sufficiently encourage large plantations. The question for the House to determine was, whether it would pay the State to give as much land as would encourage such large plantations as would really be a benefit to the country. He hoped that the Bill would not be postponed, as he thought it would endanger the passing of the Bill at this stage of the session.

Mr. HARPER said that the Bill had been discussed on the second reading, and was afterwards referred to the Waste Lands Committee, who reported it to the House without amendment. He did not think that anything would be gained by delay. The late Minister for Lands was a member of the Waste Lands Committee, who had considered the matter in all its bearings. Under the regulations referred to by the honorable member for the Taieri, a person could not obtain a grant of land until he had received a certificate from the person employed by the Governor to the effect that the trees had been properly planted; that they were of a proper character; that they were three years old, and in a proper state of growth at the time. And the applicant was precluded from using the land for any other purpose than the planting of trees. If these regulations were strictly carried out, it appeared to him that there could be no possible danger of any very large portion of the waste lands of the Crown being taken up by persons under the provisions of the Bill unless for purposes of bona fide planting. There were as yet but a very few hundred acres of land applied for, and it was not likely that this Bill would seriously affect the waste lands of the Crown. If people were prepared to plant large tracts of land according to the regulations laid down for that purpose, he thought they were fairly deserving of the amount of land proposed to be given to them. He thought the Bill might be committed, seeing that it had already been discussed upon the second reading, that it had been referred to the Waste Lands Committee, and that it had been returned to the House without amendment.

Question put, "That the word 'presently' stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

STRATH TAIERI AND OLYDE RAILWAY BILL.

Mr. PYKE moved, That the Chairman do leave the chair, for the purpose of going into Committee on this Bill.

Mr. McLEAN did not rise for the purpose of opposing the committal of the Bill — on the contrary, he was in favour of the measure; but he would like to ask the honorable gentleman in charge of it to accept an amendment, placing in the hands of the Government the option of deciding, after due inquiry, which line should be selected. The amendment he would propose would not have the effect of postponing the construction of the line. If it were found, after surveys had been made and full inquiries entered into, that the Strath Taieri line was preferable to the Palmerston line, then the Government, under his proposal, would be enabled to proceed with that line. He did not think there could be any objection to that course. The line from Palmerston had always been understood to be the one that was to be made; in fact, tenders had already been invited for a section of it.

Mr. REID was satisfied with the line fixed in the Bill, but he thought the proposals in the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th sections were not desirable. He had no objection whatever to land being set apart, if necessary, to recoup the money expended in the construction of this railway; but he was strongly impressed with the feeling that this line should be constructed by the Colonial Government, and that any proposal which handed over the line to the various County Councils, and which would enable them to borrow money at this high rate of interest, and to enter into contracts for the construction of the railway, would not be beneficial to the country. They knew, as a matter of fact, that the country would have to pay for the railway in the shape of land, and it was in the interests of the country, and of every one concerned, that the work should be undertaken by the Government and carried out by them. It would be impossible, during the ensuing recess, for them to do more than get details of surveys, plans, and estimates. In the meantime there could be no harm in passing the Bill, which would set the land aside as security. When he said that, it must be borne in mind that this land was now practically set aside, as it was not open for sale. The land being occupied in the meantime did not affect the question, for it was not likely to be open for sale at all events for the next two or three years. The present leases would expire in a very short period, and seeing that the railway was to be made through these lands, it would be as well, before the lands were sold, that the railway should be open. By that means a better price for the land would be secured. But he thought it would be a great waste of the public revenue to hand over the raising of the loans and the management of them to the County Councils, and for that reason, when in Committee, he would test the opinion of the House in regard to the sections he had named: otherwise he quite approved of the provision that this land should be set apart in order that a railway might be constructed to the interior of the Province of Otago.

Mr. PYKE said that the amendment of the honorable member for Waikouati would more properly form the subject of discussion in Committee. With regard to the remarks of the honorable member for the Taieri, he quite agreed that it was very desirable that the Government should undertake the construction of this railway; but the further proposal that the counties might construct the line had been adopted as a dernier ressort, seeing that the Government would not undertake the duty.

Motion agreed to, and Bill considered in Committee.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

On the motion that this Bill be further considered in Committee presently,

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK said this measure should be deferred. Before it proceeded further he thought honorable members should have some information as to its origin. It appeared that the people interested knew nothing whatever about it, and several meetings within the City of Christchurch and the suburban districts comprised within the drainage district were totally averse to the Bill being passed. He had tried to find out from whom the Bill emanated, and he was told from the Drainage Board. He thought the Drainage Board, who were the Local Board of Health, should not bring forward such a Bill without giving due notice to the people interested. The preamble said, "And whereas it is expedient to make further provision for supplying the Christchurch Drainage Board, as a Local Board of Health, with funds to carry out the provisions of the said Act." He did not think that that was at all necessary, as they were already provided for. Rather than that power should be given to levy rates, the Corporation of the City of Christchurch would be prepared to carry out the provisions of the Local Board of Health Act, and the Road Boards of the suburban districts included in the drainage district said they would do the same without further rating power. Formerly the road districts comprised within the drainage district levied 1s. in the pound, and with that they did all the work that the Drainage Board was doing, although perhaps not so well; and they also kept the roads in repair. Now the Road Boards levied up to the extent of 1s., and the Drainage Board up to the extent of 5d. in the pound. Yet the Drainage Board asked for power to levy a further rate of 2d. in the pound, but the people did not like this. He believed that the reason why the Christchurch Drainage Board had the powers of the Local Board of Health given to them was simply because they had machinery at their command by which the functions of the Local Board of Health could be carried out; and they also had the funds, because subsection 4 of the 16th clause of the Public Health Act said,—

"For directing the same and all other expenses incurred by such Board in the due execution of this part of this Act to be paid out of the general city, town, borough, or district rates, or out of any rates or any moneys applicable by the Board to the purposes of improving the city, town, borough, or district, or otherwise at the disposal of the Local Board."

Therefore he maintained that there was no occasion whatever, this year at all events, to impose further taxation, and it would be far better if this Bill were dropped. Sanitary measures would not be neglected, because the Local Board of Health was the Drainage Board, and they would attend to matters affecting health; and he thought a rate of 5d. would be quite sufficient to pay all the expenses incurred on account of the Local Board of Health. He really could not see what the extra expenses were, for the Drainage Board were bound to keep Inspectors of Nuisances for their own purposes. He looked through Hansard to see why it was first mooted that the Drainage Board should be the Board of Health, and the only reason he found was that the Drainage Board had the machinery and funds at their disposal necessary for carrying out the works. He maintained that provision had been made, and there was no occasion for anything further, at all events until the people interested had something to say in the matter. He had copies of resolutions passed at a public meeting held on the 25th ultimo, at Christchurch. These had been sent to other honorable members. He also had a resolution passed at a meeting held at Knightstown, in the Avon District, to the effect that the people there did not wish this Bill to be further considered until they had had an opportunity of discussing the matter. He had received information that at other places comprised within the drainage district the residents were about to hold meetings. He did not say now whether he approved of transferring the duties of the Local Board of Health to the Corporation or Road Boards; but he thought the Bill should be deferred, more especially as the people desired it. Therefore he moved, That the Bill be further considered in Committee that day three months.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT believed what the honorable gentleman had said to be thoroughly correct, and indorsed the opinions in communications he had received from the Municipality of Christchurch, and from private individuals. The people there were very much opposed to this Bill, and he hoped the Council would allow it to be either discharged, or postponed until the return of the Hon. Mr. Hall and the Hon. Mr. Buckley, who were now in Christchurch, and possibly might bring back some important information. If the Bill were postponed for, say, ten days, that would give ample time for its reconsideration.

The Hon. Captain FRASER had great pleasure in supporting the motion of the Hon. Mr. Peacock. He had received copies of resolutions passed at a public meeting held on the 25th instant at Christchurch, which were as follow:—

“City Council Office,

“Christchurch, 26th October, 1877.

“1. In the opinion of this meeting it is expedient that the Bill now before the Assembly, intitled the Public Health Amendment Act, should not be proceeded with until such time as the ratepayers of the district concerned have had time afforded to them to consider the same.

“2. That this meeting protests against any additional rating power for local purposes being given to any body outside the City Council for the City of Christchurch.

“3. That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is desirable that the powers to be exercised under the Public Health Act should be vested in the Christchurch City Council within the city, leaving the remainder of the drainage district to be dealt with by the Drainage Board.

“4. That it is desirable that copies of all Bills introduced into Parliament affecting Municipalities should be furnished by the Government to such bodies as soon as printed.

“5. That His Worship the Mayor be requested to forward the above resolutions to the Colonial Secretary and City members, with a request that effect may be given to the same during the present session.

“W. HASKINS,

“Town Clerk.”

In his opinion it was very desirable that, before Bills of this kind were introduced into Parliament, the people should have notice of the intentions of the promoters. This was the second Bill from Christchurch which had been introduced without the sanction and without the knowledge of the people. The other Bill was withdrawn, and he hoped this would be, or be recommitted that day three months.

Hon. Mr. Peacock

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that to remit this Bill to a Select Committee would only be to entail upon that Committee an amount of very unsatisfactory work. To put it off until the return of the Hon. Mr. Buckley would practically be to include it in the usual annual slaughter of innocents, which he apprehended would commence within a very few days in this as well as in another place; for it was to be hoped that the Government would, towards the end of next week, be in a position to advise His Excellency to prorogue. This Bill was one of those which showed them the extreme difficulty, at all events in the initiation of a new system, of laying down rules which would generally be acceptable in the various centres of the colony; but it would be his duty, as long as he had anything to do with these matters, to take no step in a direction in which people felt so much interested without endeavouring to ascertain what was really the state of feeling in the part of the country affected. To show what had been done in this case he would describe the history of this Bill. Last year, when the Public Health Bill was under consideration, the representatives of the City of Christchurch inserted a proviso in the 14th clause, by which the Christchurch Drainage Board, which had been constituted under the Act of 1875, was to form an exception to the whole colony. Everywhere else the Municipal Council was the Board of Health, but the Christchurch Drainage Board was the Board of Health not only for the city, but for a large extent of the environs, and that proviso was put in at the request and with the concurrence of the Christchurch Municipality. Now, from documents which had been distributed, it appeared that the Municipality, which had changed its personnel in the meantime, had a distinct objection to that proviso of the Bill this year. So it became not only difficult to ascertain the views of the people who were concerned in these matters, but their views from one year to another entirely and radically changed. Under these circumstances, he made inquiries in the various districts about, and he found that the local bodies were all willing to be Boards of Health, and the Municipality was exceedingly eager to be the Board of Health. On the other hand, the Drainage Board said, “If we have to carry out the law, we must have funds. We have incurred expenses already on the faith of the Public Health Act of last year, which gave us those powers; and, to carry out the law to the end of the year, we must be enabled to raise rates.” Whether it was a disinclination to part with power of any kind, or unwillingness to form an exception to the rule throughout the colony, or a not unnatural dislike to rating, he did not know; but when the question of providing funds for carrying out the Act was brought forward, the Municipality would have nothing more to do with it. On the other hand, the Drainage Board would not accept the proposition to levy the rates in the suburban districts and to let the Municipality have the power within the borough. Practically, there was no reasonable compromise that anybody concerned would agree to. Having referred it to the late Superintendent of Canterbury, having asked the opinion of Mr. Richardson—who had taken a very great deal of interest in this matter—and of Mr. Stevens, who, he believed, drew up that proviso, as well as of several other gentlemen in the other branch of the Legislature, he came to this conclusion: that, at least, it would be wiser to allow the Bill to go on for this year, and to provide funds until some other provision was made. He had come to the Council prepared to put the Bill through Committee. He did not think there would be any argument against that of the want of funds. There was no other way of providing them except by rates. If the honorable gentleman would confine his opposition this year to modifying the rates—which he believed, after all, to be at the bottom of the opposition—and seek to alter that in Committee, he would be disposed to support him. But the responsibility of determining the exact amount of reduction must lie with the honorable gentleman, because he had no means whatever of ascertaining what was likely to be the expenditure, and how low a rate would meet it. As opinions appeared to be so conflicting and irreconcilable, and as the one positive argument of a want of money was an existing fact that must be got over, he thought the honorable gentleman should allow the Bill to be recommitted. He must really wash his hands of the matter further. He could not say whether the honorable gentleman was right; he did not know whether the system of drainage required that all those suburbs should be included in the district; and he did not know whether the Drainage Board, in carrying out their scheme of works, were the proper people to form the Board of Health. Those were matters on which opinions differed so much that he must really leave all responsibility in the matter to the Hon. Mr. Peacock, who ought to know more about it than he did. It was a purely local matter; but he believed that, from a scientific point of view, there were very grave reasons for believing it would be highly desirable that the body which managed the whole of the drainage should also have the care of the public health.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said that when his honorable and gallant friend the Colonial Secretary made his prophecy as to the speedy termination of the session, he was reminded of the expression of wonder that any two Roman Augurs could meet each other without laughing. He looked at his honorable friend's face, and they both laughed. They felt that the "signs" in these times did not enable them, or any one, to predict very certainly the event to which he referred with becoming confidence. He wished to say one word about this Bill. He thought that the objections to it were of what an honorable member called a "parochial" character. It was the usual disinclination to pay taxes. Honorable members would recollect that the Public Health Act imposed certain duties upon municipal bodies and Highway Boards acting as Local Boards of Health; and it gave them the power to appropriate a portion of their municipal or district funds for the purpose of defraying the costs necessarily incurred in each local district in carrying out the provisions of that Act. If the present arrangement had not been operative, the City of Christchurch and the surrounding districts which were included in the drainage district would in each case have had the necessity imposed upon them of finding the funds for carrying out the provisions of the Public Health Act in their respective localities: that was to say, the City of Christchurch would have been obliged to find funds to defray the charges for the inspection of nuisances, for drainage, and for carrying out all the requirements of the Public Health Act; and the suburban districts in the neighbourhood would each have been in the same position. Honorable gentlemen would recollect that when the Public Health Act was being passed an amendment was made, towards the close of the consideration of the Bill, to the effect that, instead of the City of Christchurch and the respective suburban districts each being made a Board of Health, a Board of Health was formed of the Drainage District Board of Christchurch, which district included the city and several suburban districts. It appeared to all the members representing the Canterbury Provincial District in another place, and to the honorable gentlemen in the Council who also had a knowledge of the requirements of the Canterbury District, that the arrangement was an exceedingly good one, especially considering the peculiar difficulties in carrying out the sanitary regulations, and particularly those relating to draining in Christchurch. But the Drainage Board found that it had no power to apply its own funds, which were appropriated for special purposes, towards the carrying out of the Public Health Act; and in consequence it had been obliged to use funds which were raised for another purpose for its requirements in that direction—that was to say, for the carrying out of the provisions of the Public Health Act, not in one district, but over all the districts within its own jurisdiction. Under those circumstances, if this Board had not been in operation, the duty would have been imposed on each of the separate Boards of finding the necessary funds which had been provided for them by the Drainage Board of the district. It would seem fair, therefore, that the provision in this Bill should be carried out; that the Drainage Board should be recouped the £500 which it had already expended, and that a power, which a great many of the Local Boards would like to have, of levying a special rate for this purpose should be conferred upon it. The Bill was promoted by an honorable gentleman in another place who was a representative of Christchurch, and might be assumed to be in a position to know the wishes of the persons interested in the matter.

NEW PLYMOUTH HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL, in moving that the Speaker do leave the chair for the purpose of going into Committee on this Bill, said he had to make an explanation to the Council which he did not expect he would have to make—namely, that he entirely misled the Council on a matter of very great importance when he moved the second reading of the Bill. He informed the Council, when moving the second reading, that the allocation of the Land Fund made by the Financial Arrangements Act, which extended over the whole colony and applied to the Land Funds of all the provincial districts, made a certain definite allocation in respect to the amount which was to be paid to the New Plymouth Harbour Board. After charging the Land Fund in all the districts of the colony alike—first, with the expense of survey and administration; second, with interest and sinking fund on the permanent debt; third, with interest on railways; fourth, with subsidies to County Councils and Road Boards; fifth, with appropriations for education—the Act proceeded to say, as the sixth charge, “In the case of Taranaki, with the percentage payable under ‘The New Plymouth Harbour Board Act, 1874.’” In speaking on the second reading, he had said he did not expect that any considerable sum would be available out of the Land Fund for the objects of the Harbour Board, because it had pleased the Legislature to impose charges under the Financial Arrangements Act which, in his opinion, would prevent the payment of any considerable part of the Land Fund for a long time. But when the Bill came before the Select Committee to which it was referred, they ascertained that the Treasury held the exactly contrary opinion. The Treasury held that the 6th subsection of the 4th clause of the Financial Arrangements Act, to which he had referred, did not prevent the 25 per cent. which had been appropriated out of Land Fund by the New Plymouth Harbour Board Ordinance, being first paid over to the New Plymouth Harbour Board before any of the other charges were paid; and the Committee were informed that that had been the practice, and was now actually being done. The Committee examined the Secretary to the Treasury upon that point, and asked him, if that were the case, what then was the meaning of the prohibition which appeared to be made in section 10 of the Financial Arrangements Act, which section referred to the issue of Treasury bills in aid of the Land Fund, where the Land Fund was not itself sufficient to meet the charges. The prohibition referred to was as follows:—

“Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the issue of Treasury bills for the purpose of making good any deficiency in the percentage of Land Fund payable to the District of Taranaki under ‘The New Plymouth Harbour Board Endowment Act, 1874.’”

The Secretary to the Treasury informed the Committee that in the opinion of the Treasury these words were surplusage, and section 12 of the Act was imperative; which section said,—

“Nothing in this Act contained with respect to the appropriation or division of the Land Fund shall be deemed to alter or affect the liability of the colony to the public creditor, or to affect any permanent appropriation of or charges upon such revenue under any law in force in the colony.”

The Treasury held that, this being a permanent appropriation under a law in force in the colony, it was saved by the 12th clause. The Committee felt it to be their duty to ask the Treasury whether that interpretation did not practically necessitate the issue of Treasury bills in aid of the other charges upon the New Plymouth Land Fund, and they found that that was the case. And now, the Treasury bills authorized by the Financial Arrangements Act in respect to the whole colony having already been exhausted, the Committee found that the process by which money was now raised for the purpose of paying the charges which the Financial Arrangements Act had placed upon the Land Fund of Taranaki alike with the Land Funds of the rest of the colony, was by advances from the Consolidated Fund; and, on referring to the accounts for the quarter which had just expired, they found that, in accordance with that, advances from the Consolidated Fund had been made to carry on the surveys and pay other charges on the Land Fund of the Provincial District of Taranaki, while 25 per cent. of the cash receipts of Land Fund had been paid over to the Harbour Board. Looking to the Financial Statement of the present year, it was seen that, whereas the estimated revenue for the year from the Land Fund of Taranaki was stated at £23,000, the charges under the first five subsections of section 4 in the Financial Arrangements Act amounted to about £22,000 or £23,000, while a sum of nearly £6,000, under the designation “Miscellaneous,” was to be paid over in cash to the New Plymouth Harbour Board as the 25 per cent. The effect of that was that, the cash being paid over in the first instance to the New Plymouth Harbour Board, the colony had to provide the money for the other charges which existed under the Financial Arrangements Act. As he had misled the Council in the matter, he felt it his duty to make this explanation. He did not himself agree in the interpretation placed upon the Act by the Treasury, and was of opinion that the true reading of the Act was to charge the 25 per cent. alike with the rest of the charges, and not to impose on the colony the charges of the ordinary interest, and even of the administration and surveys, in order that the payment in cash of this 25 per cent. might first be made over to the Harbour Board. But, whether he was right in the interpretation of the Financial Arrangements Act, or whether the Treasury was right, one thing was certain, that the Treasury operated upon its own interpretation, and that they must treat the case as if the law were as the Treasury had described it to be. Although he was very much disappointed to find that it had pleased the Legislature—if such should be the true interpretation—to make an exceptional arrangement in favour of the Provincial District of Taranaki at the same time that it had pleased it to abolish other existing charges, as for instance the percentage formerly payable to the Timaru and Gladstone Board of Works, yet he did not allow that interpretation of the law to affect his desire that the Bill should be proceeded with, because, as he had said when moving the second reading of the Bill, in his opinion this was a work which ought to be carried on, even if it should have to be paid for altogether by the colony. In reference to the particular recommendations of the Select Committee, he found that the abolition of the concurrent power of mortgage could only be brought about by repealing certain clauses of the Provincial Ordinance, which he would propose to do in Committee on the Bill; and, with regard to the other recommendation, the Council would perhaps think that the clauses of the Provincial Ordinance, coupled with "The New Plymouth Harbour Board Act, 1874," gave sufficient security in the matter.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES suggested that, as the evidence taken by the Committee was not in the hands of honorable members, the committal of the Bill should be postponed.

Debate adjourned.

EDUCATION RESERVES BILL.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was one which had connection with the Education Bill still under the consideration of the Council. The general proposal was to vest in certain School Commissioners for management all lands already reserved for educational purposes in each provincial district, with the view of one-fourth being devoted to higher education and three-fourths to the ordinary primary education of the country. The Chairman of the Education Board and the Crown Lands Commissioners were the Commissioners for arbitrating between those two interests of primary and secondary education in the subdivision. It was provided by clause 9 that nothing should affect any lands that had been granted for special educational or special school purposes. The mode of appointing those School Commissioners was laid down by clause 11. Three were to be appointed by the Governor, and two by the Board. There was a certain amount of inconsistency between the 14th clause and one of the other clauses, which could be remedied in Committee. The intention was that nothing but the sites of schoolhouses should be vested in the Boards. There might be a little haziness about the endowment proposed to be made for primary education in the North Island. The intention was that 5 per cent. of the waste lands was to be reserved as an endowment for the maintenance of primary education; but this would be a diminishing quantity, and it would be absolutely necessary to fix the point of departure for that reservation. The Bill, as a whole, was rendered necessary by the present colonial education proposals. And it would commend itself to those honorable gentlemen who took colonial views on the subject of education, and perhaps to some who had strong views on the land question throughout the country. It was no doubt a Bill which, in connection with the Education Bill, would remedy some of the inequalities which at present existed in the country, and would make the burden of education, if it ever became a direct one, equal throughout the country. Feeling that this was a just principle, he would have supported it even if the measure had not been adopted by the present Government. But he must say that the care which had been bestowed upon the whole subject of education by the honorable gentleman specially in charge of it ought not to be forgotten in this country. Even emasculated as the Education Bill to a certain extent appeared to be when it came to the Council, it was a piece of legislation which promised to be the most successful of any education scheme that they had yet had in the colony. He hoped the Council would agree to read this Bill a second time, and that in Committee he would have the assistance of his honorable friend Dr. Pollen in remedying some little defects.

Clause 63.—Election of School Committees.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE moved the insertion of the following as the 1st subsection: "Where it shall be determined at any such meeting that an election of a School Committee shall be proceeded with by ballot, then the cumulative principle of voting shall be enforced at such election, and every householder shall have as many votes at every such election as there are members of the Committee to be elected, and shall have the right of giving all or any number of his votes in favour of one person, and the remainder to any one other person or more persons, or he may distribute his votes amongst the several persons to be elected in numbers and in manner as he shall think fit."

PRAYERS.

Hon. Colonel Kenny

FIRST READINGS.

Little River Cemetery Bill, Public Works and Immigration Loans Bill, Domicile Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Peninsula County Bill, Canterbury Railways Land Bill, Mount Cook Road Bill, Hokonui Education Reserve Bill, Masterton and Greytown Lands Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Canterbury Rivers Bill, Christchurch Reserves Bill, Crown Redress Bill (No. 2), Thames Water Supply Bill, Onehunga Endowments Bill.

PURAKANUI RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether, before fixing the railway station at Purakanui, he will make full inquiries as to the most suitable site for the public convenience? He hoped that, as the station was required, the Government would, before fixing on the site, take care that the station should be placed in the position most suitable for the public convenience.

Mr. LARNACH said that no site had yet been fixed upon, and before anything was done he would make a personal inspection, with a view of ascertaining which site would be best adapted for the purpose required.

COUNTIES BILL.

Mr. FITZROY asked the Government, If it is their intention to bring down an Act this session to amend "The Counties Act, 1876"?

Mr. SHEEHAN said there was already in print a Bill to amend the Counties Act, but it was drawn up by the late Government, and the present Government could not accept it in its present shape. Another Bill would be brought forward by the Government before the end of this session.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GISBORNE.—Sir, I wish to make a short explanation, in reference to the division on the no-confidence motion, why my name does not appear on the division list or on the list of pairs. I was prevented by illness from attending in the House during the last two days, but on each of those days I paired to vote for the motion of the honorable member for Egmont, and against the amendment of the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I am not aware why those pairs were not completed or allowed to be exercised in the way they should have been.

AORERE TRAMWAY.

Mr. GIBBS, in moving the motion standing in his name, might state that this particular part of the colony had very great claims on the consideration of the House. It had not as yet participated in the benefits which had accrued from the large Public Works policy, the same as other parts of New Zealand. The district was one which opened up a fine field for settlement, and required population. He had been frequently twitted in the House as representing a very small constituency, but, if this concession were made, those remarks would very soon cease to apply. As the principle had been conceded in several instances, he trusted the House would pass this motion. It was a fine, timbered country, and he was quite confident that, if the proposed tramway were constructed, the result would be a large increase in the population. With those few remarks he begged leave to move the resolution.

Motion made, and question put, "That this House will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider of an address to be presented to His Excellency the Governor, praying that land, in convenient blocks, comprising, in the whole, 20,000 acres, be set apart in the Aorere Valley for the purpose of constructing a tramway to open up the land in that valley for settlement, by connecting it with the shipping port of Collingwood; and that he will be pleased to cause surveys to be made and specifications to be prepared during the recess."—(Mr. Gibbs.)

Motion agreed to.

KINGSTON AND CROMWELL RAILWAY.

Mr. LUMSDEN, in moving the motion standing in his name, might state to the House that he was not asking that land should be reserved for this special purpose, but that he desired that the merits of the line might be placed before the House after survey had been made. The people in the Lake District, in Cromwell, Arrowtown, and other districts, were fully alive to the importance of having the line of railway extended in the direction indicated, as there was no doubt that the railway would be of great importance to those districts. They had the opinion of Mr. Blair that the proposed line, which would extend for about thirty miles, would be easy of construction, and that the line only required to reach Cromwell to open up an extensive country between Cromwell and the Lake Wanaka District. There was another matter of very great importance in connection with the construction of this line. It was well known that Southland contained what might be called the great timber reserves of the South Island. All about the District of Cromwell was a timberless country. In the upper part of the Province of Otago timber was very scarce and costly. It was a matter of great importance to that part of the country that timber should be obtained cheaply. The timber was so cheap in Invercargill that it could be obtained at half the price which it would cost in the City of Dunedin. The timber supplied from Southland could be landed at Cromwell just as cheap as it could be landed at Dunedin, and the people there would save the entire extra cost of conveying the timber from Dunedin by railway or road to the interior of the country. It would therefore be seen that this was a matter of great consideration to people in that part of the country, who were so anxious to have this line constructed. He hoped the House would accede to the motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, the further opening up of communication with the interior of the southern part of the South Island, by an extension of the line of railway via Lake Wakatipu to Cromwell, claims consideration; and therefore that it be a recommendation to the Government that a survey of the above line be made during the recess, with a view of submitting the work to the consideration of the General Assembly at its next session."—(Mr. Lumsden.)

Mr. LARNAOH said it might save the time of the House if he stated that the Government agreed with the remarks of the honorable member for Invercargill; and during the recess steps would be taken to have the line surveyed, in order that it might be brought before the House next session, to approve of or otherwise.

Motion agreed to.

KAIKOURA CATTLE.

On the motion of Mr. HARPER, it was resolved, That the Government be requested to give effect to the report of the Sheep and Cattle Committee with reference to the withdrawal of the prohibition against the removal of cattle from the Kaikoura District.

PARLIAMENTARY BUILDINGS.

On the motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, it was resolved, That this House approves of the recommendations contained in the report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the custody and control of the Parliamentary Buildings.

RIVERTON AND OTAUTAU RAILWAY.

Mr. HODGKINSON, in moving the motion standing in his name, said it was of the same character as many others which had already been brought before the House and settled this session, only that in this case there were circumstances which made his claim more reasonable than the others which had been acceded to by the House. In this case there was a railway which had been constructed by the Government to a place called Otautau. The district was a very rich agricultural district, and it also contained limestone and timber; but by extending the railway thirteen miles—in the motion it was stated sixteen miles, but he had found that thirteen miles was the proper distance—by extending it thirteen miles it would open up one of the most valuable coal fields in the colony: not that coal which was found on the West Coast, but the best description of brown coal. The field had been examined by Captain Hutton, and he had reported extremely favourably on both the quantity and the quality of the coal. Captain Hutton said it was the best description of that kind of coal that had been found in the colony. It was admirably suited for domestic purposes, and for stationary engines, and might also be used for steam navigation purposes. If the line was extended as he proposed, the present railway would be much more likely to pay than it was now. He might add that in the neighbourhood of the proposed line a great deal of land had been taken up, and more was daily being taken up on deferred payments; but in the neighbourhood of this coal field there was a large quantity of land which had not been alienated. Therefore there would be no difficulty whatever in reserving a sufficient quantity to pay for the cost of constructing the railway. He did not know that he need go further into the matter, but he hoped the House would sanction the motion, inasmuch as he believed this was the most deserving case that had yet been brought before the House.

Motion made and question proposed, "That it is expedient to extend the Riverton and Otautau Light Railway for about sixteen miles northward to the Nightcaps Coal Field; and that the Government be requested to reserve an area of land, adjacent to the railway, sufficient to provide funds for the construction of the line; said land to be surveyed into sections of moderate size, and not to be sold until the line is completed."

—(Mr. Hodgkinson.)

Mr. LARNACH hoped that the honorable gentleman would content himself with an assurance from the Government, which he (Mr. Larnach) gave, that the question of the construction of the railway would be considered during the recess, that a report on its feasibility would be obtained, and a recommendation made to the House regarding it next session.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said he had a few remarks to make on this question. Throughout the southern provinces of New Zealand railways were running in every possible direction, and these railways had been made for all possible purposes that could be imagined. He had heard that in the Province of Southland railways were made under a grand public works system absolutely before the people in the province numbered half as many more as there were people in his (Sir R. Douglas's) district. It was a most magnificent scheme, only it ruined Southland. But the honorable member was not content with that, for he now proposed to make another railway; and for what? For the purpose of enabling the district to export brown coal. Why, there was better coal than that all over the country which could be made available for export at a much less cost. The honorable member first came and got a harbour to get the coals out of, and now he wanted a railway to convey the coals to the harbour. By the time he had got all he wanted there would be another million added to the debt of the colony, in order that Riverton might export a little brown coal. How often had the House heard the honorable member for Riverton denounce the late Government for giving away the lands and money of the colony to their friends, and denounce the supporters of the late Ministry for selling their votes! One might look all through a "respectable" edition of Johnson's Dictionary and fail to find the dreadful adjectives the honorable member had applied to the conduct of the late Government and its supporters; yet the honorable gentleman's friends had scarcely become seated on the Government benches when he began asking for and obtaining promises which were so vigorously denounced when made by the late Government. He did not like to use the term, but this railway, to his mind, was a bunkum railway. It was curious to see how easily honorable members could look at matters in different lights. That which in anybody else was most improper, and amounted to buying and selling votes, was quite right when the actors changed, and the objectors themselves brought forward public works. When he (Sir R. Douglas) brought forward a matter, the justice of which was admitted on all sides of the House, he was accused of selling his vote for money and land, and so forth. The thing was humbug. He had no objection to this railway if it would really be of service; but he could not help remembering that there were other coal fields all over the colony, in connection with many of which there were first-class harbours, and which could be developed at far less cost than it was proposed to go to in this case. In Auckland there were coal fields which could be made available by means of light railways, or what might be called, in reality, tramways. There were harbours a short distance from the coal fields where the largest ships could coal, and if they were opened up there was no reason why not only all New Zealand, but the whole of the Southern Hemisphere, might not be supplied with coal therefrom. Certainly Her Majesty's ships could easily coal in them. To do this, it was not necessary to set aside 20,000 acres of land for sale. He thought it was time that the Government should seriously consider the question of opening up the coal fields. He held in his hand a memorandum referring to one district in which there was a difficulty in getting out the coal. In that district hematite, iron, and fire-clay were plentiful; but owing to the want of tramways the coal could not be turned to good account. Out of one little mine 10,000 tons of coal could easily be taken in the year, which had now to be conveyed from the mine to the port by carts. There was plenty of kauri and totara timber in the district, but it could hardly be utilized, because there was no means of conveying it from the place where it grew. The fact was that there were many and infinitely better coal fields in the colony to which tramways required to be made.

Mr. SHEEHAN was at a loss to understand the reasoning of the honorable gentleman who had just sat down. The honorable gentleman said that he was accused of being bought when he moved a similar motion last session, but he (Mr. Sheehan) emphatically denied that. The honorable member for Invercargill (Mr. Lumsden) had moved a similar resolution to this while he was a member of the Opposition, but nobody could accuse him of having been bought. The honorable member for Marsden had told the House that in his district there were coals, and fire-clay, and other things, and that it only required a tramway to make them of use to the colony. Then why did he not bring in a Bill to provide for the making of the tramway?

Sir R. DOUGLAS said that the Provincial Council of Auckland promised, in 1874, to make the tramway.

Mr. SHEEHAN said his honorable friend seemed to forget that the Provincial Councils were things of the past, and that their unfulfilled promises went for nothing. If the honorable gentleman would bring forward anything like a fair proposition, similar to the present one, for the benefit of his own district, he (Mr. Sheehan) would not oppose it. In fact, he would rather leave the Government benches than oppose such a motion simply because of its being moved by a member of the Opposition. He thought that the honorable member for Riverton would do well to withdraw his resolution, on the understanding that the Government would give their attention to the matter during the recess. He might say that the Government would consider every case of the same kind during the recess. He trusted that the honorable gentleman would withdraw his motion.

Mr. REID thought the Native Minister was rather too sensitive in regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Marsden. He observed that whenever the honorable member for Marsden rose to speak the Native Minister was not so collected as he usually was, and he generally took the trouble to give the honorable gentleman some useful information regarding himself. With reference to the promise of the honorable gentleman that these things should be inquired into during the recess, he did not think the honorable gentleman fully realized the position the Assembly and the Government would be placed in by this action. The honorable gentleman was literally inviting honorable members to come forward and make claims for reserves of land for the special purpose named in this and other similar resolutions. After the invitation of the honorable member, unless members applied for these reserves they would not be considered to be doing justice to their constituents; and the consequence would be that numerous claims for blocks of land would be made, and, as a matter of fact, if it was not unparliamentary to say so, a huge log would be rolled. He was glad, however, that the honorable gentleman was going to withdraw his motion. There had already been large blocks of land set apart during this sitting for purposes similar to that named in the motion, and he hoped the House was not going any further in that direction.

Mr. HODGKINSON rose for the purpose of withdrawing the motion, but at the same time he felt himself at liberty to express the opinion that the resolution had not been met with that fairness and candour with which similar motions had been met previously. As he had no wish to waste the time of the House, he would ask to be permitted to withdraw his motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

DR. BULLER.

Mr. FOX, in moving the motion standing in his name, hoped that the members of the Public Petitions Committee would not think he undervalued the services they rendered to the country. The Committee had a great deal of work to do, and it generally did that work in a fair and impartial manner, and saved a large amount of money to the colony. But it was possible that even the highest tribunal might commit an error of judgment, and he thought that the Petitions Committee had done so in this case. He would briefly state the circumstances of the case. Some years ago Dr. Buller was engaged to assist Dr. Featherston, who was then Native Land Purchase Commissioner, in the negotiations for the purchase of the Manawatu Block, which comprised some 250,000 or 300,000 acres. Dr. Buller proved himself to be a very valuable aide-de-camp to the Commissioner; but he received no salary from the Provincial Government, his travelling allowance was very scanty, and altogether he was placed in a position of great discomfort. The result of the negotiations was that, after three years' labour, the purchase was completed, so far as Dr. Featherston was concerned. Dr. Buller's case was brought before the Provincial Council, the members of which were of opinion that he had a good claim for compensation. It was allowed that Dr. Buller had rendered very efficient service to Dr. Featherston, in consequence of which the Provincial Government got possession of the land. A great deal of the land had since been sold and settled, and the acquisition of it had been very important to this part of the colony. The Provincial Government intended to fully recognize Dr. Buller's services. He received no remuneration from the Provincial Government, and that which he received from the General Government was very small indeed. He gave up his position as a Resident Magistrate in order to deal with this land; but, after all, the Provincial Government did not recognize his services in a proper manner. The matter was brought under the consideration of the Provincial Council. At that time the whole transaction was completed. There were claims put in on behalf of Dr. Featherston, the chief negotiator, which were afterwards satisfied in a liberal manner; but in the case of Dr. Buller the Provincial Government put the matter off to a more convenient season. His claim was strongly supported by the Provincial Executive and by the Provincial Council. The motion against its postponement was lost by one vote. After that, Dr. Buller returned to England, where, instead of enjoying a holiday, he underwent two or three years' hard work, which had no connection whatever with his past services in connection with the Manawatu Block. On his return to this country he brought his claim before the Public Petitions Committee. Owing to his (Mr. Fox's) absence from the colony, he was not able to say whether the case had come before the Public Petitions Committee last year or not. The Committee this session took some evidence in reference to Dr. Buller's claim. He understood that the evidence was partly of a documentary character. It was exceedingly favourable to Dr. Buller, and included high testimonials from the heads of the departments under whom he had served for years, and who knew the value of the work which he had performed. He believed that very warm and emphatic evidence was given by the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Bunny), who was Provincial Treasurer at the time the matter was brought before the Provincial Council. All this evidence was most confirmatory of Dr. Buller's claim, and most commendatory of the course pursued by him. It appeared that Dr. Buller was also very anxious to have some very important vidæ voce evidence given by heads of the departments under which he served, and who could bear testimony to his services. He (Mr. Fox) was informed that the Committee absolutely refused to receive the additional evidence—that, after hearing two witnesses and the documentary evidence, they rejected the evidence of a number of witnesses whom Dr. Buller had within reach, and who, as he believed, would substantiate his case. The Committee then prepared their report. Dr. Buller naturally felt himself aggrieved, and desired that the report might be referred back to the Committee, with instructions to take any further evidence which he might be prepared to offer to it. He thought Dr. Buller had been rather hardly dealt with. No injury could be done by the Committee sitting a couple of days longer to take the vidæ voce evidence of those who were within reach of this House, and whose attendance could be easily obtained. What could be the hardship of the Committee reconsidering the case? It was never wise, in his opinion, of any Committee to refuse the fullest possible investigation to the case of suitors who came before them with anything like a bona fide case. Of course there would be sometimes cases that were evidently trumped up, and which would not admit of any investigation; but this was not a case of that kind. It was a case in which a public servant had rendered very valuable services, and he (Mr. Fox) spoke from his own personal and close knowledge of those services. The petitioner had rendered very great service especially to the particular part of the country referred to, and from which it was at this moment enjoying very rich fruit. It was a case where every possible facility should be given to the petitioner to bring forward all the evidence he could in his own favour. He thought Dr. Buller had been treated by the Committee in a somewhat cavalier way, and had not received that consideration which a public officer of some twenty-three years' standing should receive—an officer whose services had always met with approbation, who left the service through no fault of his own whatever, and without any censure, but with the best testimony from those under whom he had served as to his abilities and the good services he had rendered. He trusted the honorable members of the Public Petitions Committee would not throw any obstacle in the way of the very reasonable request which, through him, Dr. Buller now made.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Dr. Buller be referred back to that Committee, with instructions to take further evidence, and to reconsider their late report."—(Mr. Fox.)

Mr. KELLY said that, if the Public Petitions Committee were to have referred back to it all the cases decided against, he thought it would take two years instead of one to dispose of the cases that came before it. With regard to this particular case, the Committee did not desire to offer any obstruction to the motion of the honorable gentleman. It appeared to him (Mr. Kelly) that the petitioner had had ample time to go to the proper quarter, the Provincial Council and Provincial Executive of Wellington, to obtain redress; but he failed to do so. If the case were referred back to the Committee, of course they would take what evidence they thought fit upon it. With this understanding he would not object to the motion.

Mr. SWANSON would not offer the slightest opposition to the adoption of the motion, but he should not like it to be inferred that the Committee had not devoted a good deal of time to this case, or that they had kept several gentlemen waiting at the door and would not listen to them. He recollected that on this particular occasion the Committee had sat from eleven o'clock until a quarter-past two to hear the evidence, part of which was the reading of a pamphlet. There were no persons waiting outside when the Committee adjourned. He did not think it could be said that the Committee did not pay attention to the cases that came before them. He demurred to the statement that the Committee were to hear such evidence as any petitioner might choose to bring forward. If that were permitted they might never get through a single case. Surely there was no necessity for the Committee to go further after it had heard sufficient evidence to confirm or disprove the truth of the statements on the face of a petition. In this case the Committee came to the conclusion that Dr. Buller had been engaged in the purchase of the property, and it was understood that he was to receive £500 as a bonus for what he did if he did it well. Whether the Superintendent had received authority from the Provincial Council to make that promise, and whether the Council ratified it, he could not say; but it was, at all events, contingent on Dr. Buller getting a good and undisputed title to the land. So far from that being the case, there had been any amount of disturbance about the matter since, and many thousand acres had to be given back to the Maoris before anything could be settled. In fact, Committees had been engaged in hearing the claims of these Maoris to the land, and he was not sure that they were all settled now. It could not therefore be said that a good and undisputed title had been obtained, such as those which were always obtained by Mr. Briesenden, although he was so much abused, and declared to be unfit to be a public servant. In this case there had been innumerable disputes, and very nearly a war; and he believed the purchase of this Manawatu Block had led to more correspondence and trouble than the purchase of any other two blocks in the country where actual war did not break out. The Committee had come to the conclusion that Dr. Buller had done service to the colony, but he had been very well paid for it. The House was told that, instead of taking a holiday when he went home to London, Dr. Buller went to work. Was he not paid for that work? It struck him that he was paid handsomely, and was kept at the expense of the colony all the time he was learning to be a lawyer. However, he had no objection to hear everything Dr. Buller and his friends might have to say in favour of his getting the money; and, if it was found to be just, the money ought to be paid.

Mr. Fox

He hoped, however, that the witnesses who, they were told, could be so easily brought down, would be summoned at the petitioner's expense, and not at the expense of the country. That was a principle which he thought ought to be laid down in cases where a Committee had come to a conclusion on what they considered sufficient evidence, and where a petitioner asked for fresh evidence to be taken.

Mr. FOX said the honorable member who had just sat down had been talking in a manner that showed he knew very little of the case—so little that he was astonished that an honorable member who was a member of the Committee did not know more about it. All the honorable member's story about Dr. Buller's negotiations having failed was so much riddle, if he might use the expression. Dr. Buller laboured indefatigably and successfully to obtain the Manawatu Block for the Provincial Government; and the result was that, out of a block of 250,000 acres—after all that had been given back to the Natives and made reserves for them, for which Dr. Buller was in no way responsible—there remained to the province a block of 140,000 acres of very fine land. As regarded Dr. Buller's going Home and receiving a salary as Secretary to the Agent-General, and thereby being very well paid as the honorable member put it, that had nothing whatever to do with this transaction. Whether he had ever been engaged in the purchase of the Manawatu Block or not, Dr. Buller was quite entitled, after seventeen years' service, to leave of absence; and if Dr. Featherston engaged him as Secretary that had nothing to do with the purchase of the block. The two things had no more connection than Tenterden Steeple and the Goodwin Sands. The only question was this: Dr. Buller was promised a certain amount if he completed the purchase of the block, and the Provincial Council did not give him the money. Was he or was he not entitled to receive what was promised to him? He (Mr. Fox) was astonished to hear such a proposal as that of the honorable member for Newton, that Dr. Buller should pay the expenses of any witnesses called by the Committee. If Dr. Buller's petition was referred back to the Committee, it was in order that justice might be done. It happened constantly that witnesses were sent for from all parts of the colony at the request of petitioners, and no demur was made to paying them, although their evidence might not be worth the paper on which it was written. Why, then, should objection be made in this case? This, however, he would say, that Dr. Buller was not so illiberal as to stick to that point, if only he could succeed in clearing his character of the apparent aspersion cast upon it by his not receiving the money which was promised to him.

L. LETTON.

Mr. REYNOLDS, in moving the motion standing in the name of Mr. Bastings, briefly explained the facts of the case. Mr. McMinnimin, the contractor for the railway from Clinton to the Mataura, failed, and the Engineer in charge of the works advised the workmen employed by the contractor to take action under the Contractors' Debts Act for the recovery of the amounts due to them, stating that there were sufficient funds in the hands of the Government to meet their claims—that was, including the 10 per cent. retained by the Government to meet claims in case the contractor failed to complete his contract. The workmen combined together, and, under the management of Lewis Letton, entered into arrangements with the Government to complete the line at the schedule prices; but it turned out that, through an error on the part of the Public Works Department, the completion of the contract at schedule prices involved a greater cost to the colony than the amount of the original contract. He held that the mistake on the part of the Public Works Department should not deprive the workmen of the 10 per cent., representing something like £1,000 or £1,200, which remained in the hands of the Government at the time of the failure of the original contractor. The Public Petitions Committee had had the petition of the workmen, Lewis Letton and others, before them; and, after going carefully into the case, they brought up the following report:—

"The petitioners state that they were employed by Messrs. McMinnimin and Co., railway contractors; that he failed, being indebted to the workmen some £1,200, of which they recovered only £40. That the Government promised that, if they completed the work at scheduled prices, the Government would pay the balance. That the works have been so completed, but that the balance due has not been paid by the Government. The petitioners pray for favourable consideration, and an investigation of their claims.

"I am directed to report that, in the opinion of the Committee, the workmen employed by the contractor McMinnimin, who did not receive their pay in consequence of his failure, are entitled to the consideration of the Government; and that the balance of the money for work done in the hands of the Government at the time of his failure should be divided among them in the proportion of their proved claims."

He believed the Committee were unanimous in that conclusion, and he hoped the House would agree to the motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should take immediate steps to give effect to the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee in the matter of the petition of Lewis Letton and others."—(Mr. Reynolds.)

Mr. LARNACH said there were funds in the hands of the Government out of which the claims could be paid, and the Government were disposed to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee.

Mr. TRAVERS was glad to hear the honorable gentleman say that the Government were disposed to give effect to the recommendation. A considerable amount of suffering had been caused by the failure of sub-contractors and others, and moneys payable to the original contractor which remained in the hands of the Government ought to be applied, as far as could be, in meeting such claims as the one before the House. A great deal of mischief had resulted from the system of accepting in all cases the lowest tenders for public works. He had reason to believe that the system of accepting tenders which were below the estimates of the Government engineers had led to a large number of insolvencies throughout the colony. If the Government engineers were qualified to make estimates of cost, it was an unsound system, simply because there was great competition, to accept tenders which were below the estimates of the Government engineers. The system ought to be abandoned, because its ultimate result was to throw great loss and suffering upon the labouring-man, who was least able to protect himself. There was an Act in force by which a labouring-man might be protected, but the sub-contracting system had rendered that Act a dead-letter. Attempts had been made to enforce it in several instances, but conflicting judgments had been delivered by the Supreme Court. A judgment was given one way by the late Chief Justice, Sir George Arney, and another judgment was given in the Wellington judicial district, which conflicted with it; but in both instances the labouring-men who sought payment failed in obtaining the moneys they had honestly earned, and which they had lost through the failure of the contractor or the sub-contractor. Some alteration in the law should be made in order to prevent this. There should be some special provision for compelling the payment of wages due to labouring-men employed by contractors. No doubt it was a difficult question; but still it was a question of great importance, and one that should be grappled with. He should support the motion, because it involved a sound principle. He did not think the Government ought to profit by the failure of contractors, more especially where they chose to let works at a price manifestly under the cost at which they could properly be carried out.

Motion agreed to.

CATLIN'S RIVER TELEGRAPH.

On the motion of Mr. THOMSON, it was ordered, That this House will to-morrow resolve itself into Committee, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates the sum of £2,000 for the purpose of extending the telegraph to Catlin's River.

J. FOLEY.

The adjourned debate was resumed on the question, That, in the opinion of this House, the recommendation contained in the report of the Gold Fields Committee upon the petition of John Foley, of St. Bathans, should be given effect to.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR explained that when the motion first came up it was adjourned in order to enable the Government to obtain information on the subject. He might point out that there was nothing in the report which in any way made it binding on the Government to expend money. The report simply set out the facts upon which the parties claimed assistance. It was a substantial claim, but the report pointed out that there was nothing within the knowledge of the Committee to show in what way such a claim could be met, and it asked the Government, if it did not see its way to meet such claims, to indicate clearly in all such cases what course it would take on the subject of subsidizing arduous undertakings on the gold fields. There was nothing in the report that pledged the Government to a grant of money now or in any future time, and he therefore hoped the report would be adopted.

Mr. SHEEHAN said the Government would offer no objection to the adoption of the report.

Mr. REID did not think the honorable member for Mount Ida had correctly interpreted the tenor of the report, and he was also surprised that the Government had so readily assented to its adoption. He (Mr. Reid) was in charge of the department when the report was brought up, and its consideration was then deferred in order to give him an opportunity to obtain information in regard to it. He left behind him documents which were now in the possession of the Government, which would show how the matter stood; and, from what he knew of the matter, he must say that this was a very reckless way of dealing with the public funds. He understood that by the adoption of the report a sum of £800 would be paid to this company. The paragraph which bore out that opinion was as follows:—

"The Committee have come to the conclusion that the Warden's recommendation is a fair one—viz., 'That the construction of the channel be subsidized to the extent of eight hundred (£800) pounds for the second mile; payment to be made as each section of 10 chains is completed, at the rate of one hundred (£100) pounds per ten chains.' They therefore adopt it as their recommendation to the Government."

If the Government agreed to that, he did not see how they could possibly avoid the payment of the £800. If the House did not agree to the payment of the £800 it should negative the report. If the claim were a just one he would say, by all means, pay it; but his impression was that there was no good ground for such a claim. There were many statements in the report with which he did not agree. It was true that he was a member of the Committee, but he did not happen to be present when the report was drafted. The position of the matter was this: A company desiring to develop certain supposed auriferous land on the gold fields of Otago applied for and obtained an extended area of land for the purpose of constructing a sludge channel, which would involve a considerable expenditure of capital. There was more than one party prepared to take up the land; but ultimately the land was given to the persons who were now the owners of this claim. An extended area was given to them, and they were prepared to invest their capital on the prospect of having a rich claim. As matters went on, however, it was found that the work involved a larger outlay than was anticipated. Then, he did not quite know how it came about, but, on an application either to the Provincial or to the Colonial Government, the Warden of the district was asked to report on the matter; and he went a little bit out of his way, as he (Mr. Reid) thought, to report that £800 should be paid to this company, as mentioned in the Committee's report. The Warden had simply been asked to inquire into the whole of the circumstances of the case, and to report upon them. If the House was to grant money simply on the recommendation of the Wardens who reside in the districts, and who, naturally, are disposed to make things as pleasant as possible, he could only say that that would be an improper way of disposing of the revenue of the colony. There were plenty of other miners who had equal claims, and who could come and ask to be subsidized in their ordinary avocations with equal justice; and was it right that men who might be more shrewd or far-seeing, or who better understood how these matters could be brought before Parliament, should obtain an advantage? If the House agreed to this motion they would be giving a premium to the petitioners, and would be doing an injustice to other miners who were engaged in developing the resources of the gold fields. He should move the adjournment of the debate. He could not see that these men had a claim at all, because under the regulations it was necessary that the persons engaged in these works should, in the first instance, apply to the Governor and obtain the consent of the Governor to the works proposed. But, inasmuch as this had not been done, he did not see that the petitioners had any claim, and, beyond that, he believed there were now no moneys available for the purpose. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would agree to postpone the matter until they had time to go further into the subject.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR pointed out to the honorable member for the Taieri that he misapprehended the object in view—it was not to give £800 to these men. The object in view was this: If the Government elected to say it would not propose to bring down any more votes for the purpose of assisting in specially arduous mining enterprises upon the gold fields—and the Committee recognized that there were now no funds—then that intention should be clearly intimated not only at St. Bathans, but on every gold field, so that in future the local bodies might be looked to; but, on the other hand, if the Government intended to keep up that system, then these men had a fair claim. In the last clause of the report the issue was very fairly put to the House. There was no recommendation that £800 should be paid to these men. The simple recommendation was, let the policy of the Government be known to all. There was nothing binding upon the Government, or calling upon them to pay £800. He hoped that the motion for adjournment would be withdrawn, because it was very desirable that the question should be settled.

Mr. TRAVERS said, looking at the report of the Committee, it did not appear that it in any degree met the intention of the Public Works Act. The clauses of the Public Works Act referred to contemplated the existence of a contract for a work which the Governor approved, because the Governor must be satisfied that the undertaking was one which would justify him in charging a portion of the cost upon the public revenues. It was never intended to assist persons who entered upon purely speculative transactions, and then found themselves in a difficulty. The clause provided,—

"The Governor may contract with any person to make, maintain, and work a water-race—(1.) Either by agreeing to pay the contractor a subsidy not exceeding the amount agreed to be expended, and expended by the contractor in construction of such water-race; (2.) Or by agreeing to pay the contractor year by year such sum as shall, together with the net profit of working the water-race, make up 6 per cent. yearly upon the amount agreed to be expended, and expended in the construction thereof."

The Act never contemplated persons making a race as a private speculation, and then, on the speculation turning out to be unremunerative, applying to be recouped in consequence of any loss they may have sustained, or to be aided by a subsidy in the manner suggested by the report of the Committee. He thought the motion of the honorable member for the Taieri a proper one. The matter should receive further consideration, because this clearly was not a case contemplated by the provisions of the Act.

Mr. LARNACH thought, after the explanation of the honorable member for Mount Ida, the motion should be agreed to, and that the honorable member for the Taieri should withdraw his amendment.

Mr. REID said he had no objection to withdraw the motion if the Government would undertake to resist any payment of money to these persons.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR was quite willing to accept an assurance of that kind from the Government. It was never intended that the Government should be bound to pay this £800.

Motion for adjournment negatived, and original motion agreed to.

TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. STEVENS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that he had placed the notice on the Order Paper some time since, with two objects in view. One was to obtain what he thought necessary for public information, and the other was to cure what he considered to be a mischief in the management of our Trust Funds. There was now before the House a very important return of the Public Trust Funds; but the House was not at present in possession of any information, so far as he was aware, as to the securities in which these funds were invested; and, although the subject had been brought up by a question put by the honorable member for Totara, it seemed to him that if he called attention to this subject again it would be found rather advantageous than otherwise. He believed it would be found, from the return which he had asked for, that there was considerably over £900,000 of Trust Funds, which were invested in a variety of securities; but the whole of these were securities of the colony. There were two or three exceptions, he believed—some mortgages and bonds of local bodies—but the greater portion of the money was invested in the securities of the colony, including Treasury bills and debentures of different denominations, such as the Defence and General Purposes Loan, and others. But the view he took of the matter was this: He did not think the colony would at any time be unable to meet its engagements; but it might be worth while to consider whether they should not make some perfectly satisfactory arrangement for the protection of the funds that were in trust, more especially considering the magnitude of the amount involved. For instance, there was the Post Office Savings Bank, in which funds were invested to the amount of £720,000 or £780,000. There had been a good deal of discussion, both in the House and in another place, on this point, and there had been two or three proposals made for doing away with any risk in connection with the Post Office Savings Bank funds. He could not say that any of those proposals were to his mind satisfactory. One proposal was that the system which prevailed in Austria should be introduced—namely, to make necessary notice of withdrawal something similar to that required in ordinary banking business, in order to prevent a run upon the funds. He believed the adoption of such a course would materially interfere with the value of the institution. Ever since the establishment of the system in 1866, people had become so accustomed to the privilege of being able to withdraw their money at call, that any imposition of restraint, such as calling upon people to give notice of the withdrawal, would meet with public disapproval. He would be very sorry to see the colony do otherwise than invest the greater portion of its trust funds in its own securities, because the colony was able to give a much higher rate of interest to depositors than it would be able to give on any other system on the money in the Post Office Savings Banks. At the same time he was strongly of opinion that the colony should make provision for supplying any funds that might be wanted if there happened to be a sudden rush made upon the Trust Funds. As he had made a complaint, he was disposed to take this opportunity of making a suggestion, by way of remedy, to the Colonial Treasurer—namely, that the Trust Funds should be treated separately from all other funds in the hands of the Government, and that special arrangements should be made with the Government banker to provide a good sound proportion of the amount of money placed in the hands of the Government—for the present he thought from £300,000 to £400,000 would be abundant—to meet any sudden demand on those funds. He had tabled the motion with a view of drawing attention to the subject, and with the hope that something would shortly be done by the Government in the direction he had indicated.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid on the table a return of the securities held against the Public Trust Funds."—(Mr. Stevens.)

Mr. LARNACH said that the return asked for was a very important one. Hitherto the House had not been sufficiently vigilant in this direction, but appeared satisfied with the way in which the Trust Funds had been managed. The present Government, however, would have much pleasure in endeavouring to alter this state of things by seriously considering the question, and they would furnish the return asked for at the earliest possible moment. He would point out that it was a very serious thing to invest the whole of the money deposited with the Government in Government securities alone, and it rested with the House to say whether this system should prevail for the future, or whether a certain proportion of the Trust Funds should be invested in the manner suggested by the honorable member for Christchurch City, or in some other legitimate way, and not by lending them to ourselves.

Mr. REES had taken considerable interest in this matter during the last two or three years. In fact, nearly three years ago he communicated with the late Colonial Treasurer, Major Atkinson, on the subject. It seemed to him that the colony was falling into rather a dangerous condition, inasmuch as the Savings Bank funds were being invested in Treasury bills. It occurred to him that if the persons who deposited their money with the Government were suddenly to make a demand for the return of that money, and if the colony were pushed, there would be a great deal of difficulty in raising the amount that would be necessary to satisfy them. He wrote to the late Colonial Treasurer, from whom he received an elaborate reply. He (Mr. Reese) suggested that some of the guaranteed debentures should be placed to the credit of the Trust Funds, because those debentures were always good in the market and could always be realized. Therefore investors could always rely on having some guarantee for their money. The late Colonial Treasurer replied that the Ministry believed the current securities of the colony were ample security, and therefore they could not accept the advice. Since that time the funds had increased, but there was now a very small cash balance in hand. The amount of money invested with the Government by the public was about £882,000, but he believed that out of that amount there was only about £50,000 in the shape of cash in hand, the rest of the money being invested either in the ordinary debentures of the colony, payable at some future date, or in Treasury bills. If, then, the Government were to be called upon suddenly to restore the money to the proper owners, they might not be able to do so. He thought the return asked for by the honorable member for Christchurch City ought to be laid on the table at once. Indeed, he understood it was already prepared. When the return was laid on the table, the honorable member for Christchurch City could bring forward some resolution in relation to the matter, for the purpose of carrying out his views, and then the honorable gentleman would undoubtedly be doing good service to the colony. The Trust Fund concerned a large number of people, and those who had invested their money with the Government might at any moment find themselves compelled to withdraw their funds from the possession of the Government. At present such investors were placed in a very much worse position than any others who had invested in other securities. The House should not allow that state of things to continue. He hoped the House would see that there should always be a sufficiency of cash in hand to meet any ordinary demands which might be made, or, at any rate, securities on which money could be raised at once. The condition of the Trust Fund had for a long time been unsatisfactory, and it was plain that the colony ought, under any circumstances, to be able to maintain its credit in that particular branch.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF SPIRITS TO NATIVES.

Mr. SUTTON, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that several weeks ago he asked the late Government whether it was their intention to bring in a Bill to repeal the Ordinance of 1847 referring to the supply of liquor to the Native people, and, as he did not receive a satisfactory reply, he now put this motion on the Order Paper. There were very few members of the House who had ever seen the extraordinary Ordinance which was passed in 1847. In the part of the country from which he came there were at the present time not more than two copies of that Ordinance. There were no publicans or holders of wholesale licenses for the sale of liquor who knew exactly what the law was, and in a Hawke's Bay paper which he saw a few days ago he observed that an hotelkeeper had been fined for selling one glass of ale to a Native in contravention of that Act. If it was the intention of the Government to keep such an Ordinance on the Statute Book—an Ordinance which, in his opinion, ought long ago to have been repealed—he thought there ought to be a proper Act, so that hotelkeepers and others who sold liquor should know what it was. He moved the motion standing in his name.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the Ordinance, No. 3, passed 12th August, 1847, referring to the supply of liquors to the Native race, be reprinted, with a view of distributing the same for public information, and that all holders of publicans' and wholesale licenses throughout the colony shall be supplied with copies."—(Mr. Sutton.)

Captain RUSSELL said it appeared to him that the honorable gentleman who spoke last was not aware that every publican and seller of liquor as well as every other man was supposed to know the law, and that it was no excuse for any person to say that he did not know the law. He (Captain Russell) was sorry that the Ministry of the day had not seen their way to bring in a Bill to repeal the Ordinance referred to. In his opinion it was an extremely important matter that these Ordinances specially referring to the Native race should be got rid of. He thought the time had come when an attempt should be made to amalgamate the two races. He thought they should not keep Ordinances on the Statute Book which made a difference between the two races. If any honorable member took the trouble to read the Ordinance he must see that it was absolutely inoperative. As a matter of fact, no honorable member of the Native race had a right to get a glass of beer at Bellamy's. He believed that any waiter at Bellamy's who supplied a Native member with a glass of beer, or even a glass of shandygaff, was liable to a penalty of £10. The Ordinance went even further than that. It provided that if anybody asked a Native to have a glass of fermented liquor he was liable to a penalty for so doing. Everybody must recognize the fact that the law was inoperative. In no part of the North Island where he had ever been was there the slightest difficulty in the way of the Natives obtaining liquor. It must be patent to everybody that to have a law on the Statute Book which was openly defied in every possible direction could only result in harm. It must teach their Maori fellow-subjects to have a disrespect for the law instead of a respect for it, which was one of the first duties of the Assembly to endeavour to inculcate in their minds. He saw by the 5th clause of the Act it was stated,—

"It shall be lawful for the Governor from time to time to modify or alter or suspend the operations of any of the provisions of this Ordinance which it may appear to him, from the state of Native feeling on the subject or otherwise, to be impracticable or inexpedient to carry into immediate operation, and to substitute for any provision which may be so suspended any other provision or provisions better adapted to give effect to the purposes of this Ordinance, and to secure the concurrence of the Native inhabitants of the colony therein."

If his colleague had moved that the Governor should be respectfully requested to suspend the operation of this Act throughout the whole of the colony it would have been a more sensible motion than that which he had now brought before the House. He (Captain Russell) was as anxious as anybody could be to assist by every means in his power to stop the spread of drunkenness amongst the Native population; but the keeping of this Ordinance on the Statute Book did not tend in that direction. If it did anything it tended to increase drunkenness, inasmuch as the timid dealer might be afraid to sell liquor to the Natives, while more unscrupulous or bolder publicans would be willing to do so. He knew that the Natives could get liquor in any quantity, and that they would take it to their pas, instead of drinking it openly in the hotel, as the Europeans did. He had known the Natives of a whole pa to be drunk at one time from liquor purchased wholesale. He thought it was a great mistake to keep any Ordinance on the Statute Book, which was absolutely inoperative; and for that reason it was his intention, when the proper time came, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the existing Act, and to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors to persons of the Native race. He would like to hear what the Native Minister had to say on the subject, when perhaps the necessity for his bringing forward such a motion would be obviated.

Mr. SHEEHAN had no objection to the resolution, provided all the words after the word "reprinted" were struck out. He did not see why the Government should be called upon to supply copies of the Act to publicans any more than to other persons. The Ordinance might be reprinted, and sold to the public as other Acts were, and then those gentlemen might provide themselves with copies in the ordinary way. He was not prepared to admit that the Ordinance referred to was a disgraceful one, and one which ought not to be on the Statute Book. He thought it was a wise Ordinance at the time it was passed, and if it had been properly enforced it would have been a good thing for both races. The principal curse to the Native people was their consumption of ardent spirits; and if they were to preserve the Native race, and work hand-in-hand with them in the progress of this colony, they should take some steps to prevent them indulging in the unfettered drinking of intoxicating spirits. He did not say that the law was in a satisfactory condition, but honorable members seemed to overlook the fact that this was not the only law in force on this subject. There existed on the Statute Book "The Outlying Districts Sale of Spirits Act, 1870," which had been brought into force in several parts of the North Island. He would point out that at present the Natives could get liquor in one place and not in another. They could cross an imaginary boundary-line and drink themselves full, though, if they obtained one glass of wine on the other side of that boundary-line, it was an offence against the law, and punishment would ensue. Whilst it was not desirable to retain the Ordinance in its present position, they would be acting unwisely in wholly removing the restriction. What would be a fair solution of the difficulty, and one that was asked for by the great body of the Native people, would be to give them a power similar to what was given to Europeans under the Permissive Bill, and similar to that asked for under the Local Option Bill—the power of excluding the use of spirits within their own districts. If the honorable member for Napier (Captain Russell) desired to bring in a Bill, it should be a measure going in the direction of giving the Native people the power of prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors in their own districts. Those who had lived any time among a Maori population would know that a great moral benefit would result from such a power of prohibition. The great evil did not arise so much from the drinking of intoxicating liquors in the European towns as from the quantity which the Natives carried back with them to their settlements and consumed there. They brought large quantities of liquor with them, and their orgies were sometimes of two or three weeks' duration. If the law were so altered as to give the Natives a voice in saying that the use of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited in the Native settlements, he believed that two-thirds of the Native people would come forward voluntarily and ask that such a law should be put into force in their respective districts, so as to enable them to prohibit the importation and consumption of ardent spirits, except for medicinal purposes, within their limits. That being done, he thought the House would have accomplished all that possibly could be done. If they attempted to enforce the law as it now stood throughout the colony, they would be doing a gross injustice and hardship. It had been allowed to remain a dead-letter for the last twenty years, and had become inoperative. It would be very difficult to secure a conviction under the existing Ordinance. He had intended to bring in a Bill this session in the direction indicated, and he did not say that he should not do so. He would be glad if the honorable member for Napier (Captain Russell) would consult with him upon the subject, and, if the honorable gentleman's views were in harmony with his own, he would draft a Bill to carry out the object desired—namely, the granting to the Native people the power of preventing the importation and use of ardent spirits in purely Native districts.

Captain RUSSELL would be very happy to adopt the suggestion of the Hon. the Native Minister. He would not bring forward a motion asking leave to introduce a Bill, as he had no desire to do anything except to put the law into a proper shape.

Mr. SUTTON cordially agreed with the Native Minister in his view as to the direction legislation should take on the subject. Such a measure as the honorable member had indicated would be valuable to the Natives, and remove a very great deal of misunderstanding and hardship. He had no objection to the omission of all the words after the word "reprinted."

Motion as amended agreed to.

LIBRARY.

Mr. REYNOLDS, in moving the motion standing in his name—"That the finances of the colony do not justify any expenditure, this session, on the Parliamentary Library"—said he had been induced to put this motion on the Order Paper some time ago in consequence of an answer to a question given by the late Government that it was their intention to bring down a vote for the erection of a new library building. When they were proposing to raise fresh taxation, and when they knew that their finances were not in the most flourishing condition, this was not the time to expend money in public buildings that were unnecessary. The library attached to the House was quite good enough for the requirements of Parliament. Of course it might be said that the library was not quite so safe against fire as if the building were erected of fireproof material, either brick or concrete; but they ought to study the question from the financial point of view. They should ask themselves whether they could afford those luxuries. Honorable members must admit that they could not afford them at the present time; and therefore they ought to do without them, and run the risk—if there was any great risk—as to fire.

HOUSE RESUMED.

NATIVE MARRIAGES BILL.

Mr. TAIAROA, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he had brought it forward with the view of validating certain marriages between persons of the Native race. It was said that those marriages were at present invalid which had not been celebrated by clergymen. He would not go into the details of the Bill, but would content himself with moving the second reading.

Mr. WHITAKER said the Bill appeared to him to go further than the honorable gentleman perhaps meant it to go. As far as the validation of future marriages was concerned, he thought there should be no difficulty whatever about that; but it appeared to him that the Bill would have the effect of validating marriages which had taken place years ago, and great confusion would thus be caused in those cases where Native women had disposed of property. He would not oppose the second reading of the Bill, as he understood that it was not to be committed that night; but when in Committee he would move that a clause be inserted which should provide that the Bill would have no effect at all on property which had been already disposed of. This Bill was retrospective in its character, and therefore it would be dangerous. As a rule he was opposed to all retrospective Bills. He could see no objection to legalizing Native marriages in the future, but he could see great objection to validating marriages which had taken place many years ago, and thus invalidating titles which were now good.

Mr. STOUT could not understand why there should be any objection to this Bill, but if there were any objection to it he thought the House should be informed as to what it was. It seemed to him to be a very harmless measure. Clause 3 said,—

"Every marriage heretofore celebrated between Natives, where the marriage ceremony shall have been performed by any person who at the time was duly authorized by law to celebrate marriages, shall be deemed and taken to be, and to have been from the time such ceremony was performed, valid and binding, notwithstanding that any other requirements of the marriage laws then in force may not have been complied with."

He could not see what objection there could be to validate a marriage which had been performed by an officer of the Government. Could it be said for a moment that, because the officer of the Government, or the clergyman, might not have complied amongst the Natives with some technical requirement of our marriage law, the marriage was invalid, and the children illegitimate? Red-tape was all very well in its way, but it should not be carried to this extreme. As far as it affected the rights of children, what did that amount to? It only meant that at the death of the parents the children should inherit any property that was left.

Mr. WHITAKER would state a case. Suppose a woman sold any property when the actual requirements of the marriage law had not been strictly complied with.

Mr. STOUT said that would not matter so long as her husband assented.

Mr. WHITAKER would like to know what would happen if the assent of the husband had not been given.

Mr. STOUT said it would make no difference if the husband had got the consideration-money. The provision that the children should be deprived of their rights should only be made to refer to those cases in which the person who dealt with the woman knew her to be unmarried. But nothing of the sort should take place when those persons did not know that the ceremony had not been performed. Where the persons who dealt with the woman were ignorant on this point, it would be most unfair to step in and deprive the children of their property. He agreed that a proviso ought to be inserted in the Bill to the effect that, where a person had dealt without the knowledge that the woman with whom he was dealing was married, the rights of the children might be interfered with, but that where there was that knowledge the rights should not be taken away.

Mr. SHEEHAN said the proposal of the honorable member for Waikato was one that could be entertained and discussed in Committee. He objected to the clause referred to, and he hoped the honorable member in charge of the Bill would see his way to withdraw it, as it asked too much. The only point was that by the neglect or ignorance of the person appointed to celebrate marriages between Natives a technical defect might take place, and it might be said that the persons were not lawfully married. However, the question raised could be discussed in Committee, and the Bill might now be read a second time without further debate.

Mr. SUTTON thought the Bill objectionable, as it might bring about a state of things not at all desirable. There was a Registrar in almost every town, and the Natives had no more trouble than other persons in obtaining marriage licenses. He objected to the Bill on the ground that it was retrospective; and, so far as futurity was concerned, he would not give to those persons who were married according to Native customs the same right to property as if they were married according to European customs. It would be the duty of the duly-authorized person to perform the marriage ceremony between persons of the Native race according to the English law, but he knew of clergymen who had not done so. They should leave the question of the right to property to be settled in the same way and under the same law as such questions were settled between Europeans.

Mr. TRAVERS said that the question raised by the honorable member for Waikato was whether, in cases where such marriages were treated as void by the parties to them, the Bill might not affect land transactions carried out by such persons since the date of the marriage. He apprehended that his honorable friend wished to guard against the inconvenience arising from the validation of a marriage ab initio which the persons might have chosen to treat as absolutely void when dealing with their property.

LOCAL OPTION BILL.

This Bill was further considered in Committee.

Mr. REES moved, That the Chairman leave the chair.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir G. GREY.—I move, as to-morrow will be the Prince of Wales's birthday and a public holiday, That the House, at its rising, do adjourn to half-past two o'clock on Monday.

Major ATKINSON.—I trust honorable members will not agree to the proposition, as there is very important business before the House. No doubt there are many honorable members who desire to treat the majority of this House with contempt and disrespect, but the House will not be found to submit to such treatment. In addition to the other notices on the Paper, I have one of very great importance, and I am sure it will meet with the approval of a considerable majority that we should sit to-morrow, and continue business on Saturday, if necessary, so as to get through with it.

Mr. STOUT.—I can hardly understand the opposition of the honorable member for Egmont to the proposal for adjournment, as it is in all cases usual to adjourn on such a day as the Prince of Wales's birthday. The honorable member says there is a great deal of private business on the Order Paper, but he has lately shown a great deal of obstructiveness to the carrying on of that business. If the honorable gentleman and those who act with him had really desired to forward the business of the House, it might by this time have been prorogued. What the honorable gentleman's object is I cannot say. I am sure it cannot be for the purpose of getting into office again, for there is not the faintest hope of his doing so. The honorable gentleman says he has an important notice on the Paper, and I presume that is the motion in regard to want of confidence. I do not think that motion is of much importance. I apprehend that the reason why the honorable gentleman gave notice of it is a very reasonable one. He was debarred the other day from having his reply as mover of the last vote of want of confidence, and, having lost his right, he has taken a course which is usual, and has given notice of another motion, in order that he may have an opportunity of making his speech. It cannot mean anything else. I do not wonder at the honorable gentleman being anxious to get a reply, for we saw that there was nobody on his side of the House who could say anything in his behalf, and he was left alone. The division came on more suddenly than was expected, and the honorable member for Wai-kouaiti could not get out his financial statement. I noticed that he received a number of slips from his friends around him, but he did not seem to know what to do with them; and I can therefore very well understand the honorable member for Egmont and his friends wishing to make further statements. That is a very proper thing for him to do in his position towards the country. There are actually some people who say that there was indecent haste in the honorable gentleman's desire to get back into office. He no doubt wishes to reply to that. Then there is a statement, which I can hardly credit, that there are certain honorable gentlemen, who only a short time ago said they had no confidence in the honorable member for Egmont, and could not trust him, in the present critical position of the colony, with the charge of the finances, yet who are actually going to vote with him now. He will, no doubt, have to enlarge at some considerable length upon that subject, and that in itself will probably make that motion an important one in his eyes. Then there were other members—for example, the honorable member for the Taieri and the honorable member for Avon—who did not address the House, and who will, no doubt, wish to do so. I feel sure that anything the honorable member for Avon has to say will be listened to with great respect, because he has always protested against a continuous Ministry, and against the idea that there was only one class of men in the colony who were competent to rule. He has always held that there were sufficient honorable members of ability in the House, outside of the Government, who could form a Ministry, and I have no doubt the honorable gentleman still holds that opinion, and will take this opportunity of explaining it, or state what was the cause of his sudden change of views in regard to the question. I feel certain the honorable gentleman, when he addresses the House, will be able to explain what principles should guide honorable members in reference to their political conduct—namely, whether there should be adherence to party ties and principles, or whether honorable members should be guided simply by personal feelings and, perhaps, personal animosity having no relation whatever to political matters. I have no doubt the honorable member for Avon, when he addresses the House, will be able to explain his conduct in a way that will satisfy this House and the public outside. I feel sure, also, that rumours which have been circulated in the lobbies with regard to cards being handed about with the names of certain honorable members on them as those who are to form a Ministry are not true. I am sure the honorable member for Avon will say that it is not true that he is to be a leader in the assault upon the Treasury benches, and I am certain the honorable members for Nelson City have not all assented to it; or, if it be true that their names are on those cards, they have been put there without their consent. They would not for one moment allow their names to be abused in such a manner, because there are people outside who criticise our actions, and they might make accusations which those honorable members might not feel it pleasant to listen to. As the honorable member for Egmont has stated that this motion of his is important, I should like to know in what its importance lies. So far as Parliamentary precedent goes, I am sure he will not find one for a motion of this kind being given the very day after a vote of want of confidence has been decided. Those who saw the agitated state of mind in which certain honorable gentlemen and the honorable member for Egmont were yesterday must have sympathized with them. They had made up their minds that they would succeed, and, being defeated, they felt very much put out; but that is no reason why they should seek to obstruct business. I am sure the honorable member only aims at serving his country, and therefore cannot suppose that this Parliament is so devoid of men of ability and influence that there are none in it but himself and his followers who can guide the affairs of the country. He cannot suppose that some dire calamity will follow if he cannot get back on those seats, and act in the manner so well described by the honorable member for Totara as servile in the session and defiant in the recess. I am sure that the honorable member for Totara would never by his vote aid the honorable member for Egmont and his late colleagues to get back on the Treasury benches. I hope the honorable member for Egmont will act on this occasion as he has done on many others when an adjournment has been proposed. For example, this very week an adjournment was proposed, and he at once jumped up and opposed it; but the honorable member for Wellington City immediately afterwards said the adjournment might be agreed to, and then the honorable member for Egmont acquiesced. That shows a very conciliatory spirit, and I feel certain the honorable gentleman was not at all afraid that he might lose the vote of the honorable member for Wellington City if he went against him in the matter of adjournment. The honorable member for Wellington City is not present now, but I have said all I could to induce the honorable member for Egmont to agree to the adjournment, and I have no doubt that he will act in the same conciliatory spirit on the present occasion, and withdraw all opposition. I hope the honorable gentleman will do that, and set an example to the House, by showing that no ill-feeling exists and that party spirit has no place here. I hope he will get up and say, "I was in error in opposing the adjournment. I have consulted with the honorable member for Avon, and we will withdraw all opposition."

Mr. ROLLESTON.—Some days ago the House was asked to adjourn, with the view of receiving, through Ministers, or through any other source by which it might come, an expression of His Excellency's intention with regard to the resolution relating to its privileges which was passed by this House. That was a resolution which a certain portion of this House declined, for very good reasons as I thought, to express any opinion upon at all; and we were asked to adjourn until the question, which was evidently viewed by the Government, and by a considerable section of the House, as one of the utmost urgency, should be settled. The question was said to be of the greatest importance to the country and to the House, and no business was to be taken until it was disposed of. Contrary to our expectations, that question did not come on, and, as we know, a division took place which was entirely unexpected. Now we are asked to adjourn again. What for? Not to await His Excellency's answer to the resolution forwarded to him by this House. That seems to have lost its urgency altogether, and I think we should be told what its position now is. We have a right to know that before we adjourn into next week.

Sir G. GREY.—Perhaps I may be allowed to state that I think it probable His Excellency's answer may be placed before the House to-night.

Mr. REES.—The House expected a treat from the honorable member for Avon, and it has been disappointed. The honorable member for Dunedin City asked the honorable gentleman if he was aware that his name was being used as one of a new Ministry. The stars in their courses having fought against the honorable gentleman on the last occasion, and the defeat of the present Ministry being thought to be imminent, a new Ministry is to be formed, in which the honorable gentleman is to take a prominent part. Everybody expected the honorable gentleman to disclaim having allowed his name to be used in this way. That gentleman, among others, had, up to a recent period, a name which was well known and much respected in political circles in New Zealand. So far as I have heard, his political reputation was unblemished, and when you came to prick out the position of the members of this Assembly on the political chart you always knew where to place him. But I am afraid you can do that no longer. He spoke and voted against the honorable member for Egmont as Premier.

Mr. Stout

He stated solemnly that that honorable member was no longer fit to be intrusted with the task of administering the affairs of New Zealand. Yet within a week of giving that solemn promise he absolutely and literally bound himself to follow that honorable gentleman on to the Ministerial benches; and ever since the honorable member for Egmont has done nothing but evince indecent haste to get into office.

Mr. McLEAN.—Are these statements relevant to the question of adjournment?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No doubt the discussion has travelled beyond the question immediately before the House; but that naturally arises out of the statement of the honorable member for Egmont, who referred to the importance of his motion as a reason why the House should not adjourn till Monday. I am not disputing the propriety of that view; but, at the same time, when an important motion is brought into the discussion by references such as those of the honorable member for Egmont, it is fairly open to be criticised. Hence it is that we have got into a discussion that is growing wider and wider. I do not know where to stop it. I can only hope that honorable members will confine their remarks as much as possible to the question of adjournment.

Mr. REES.—Inconsistency in its public men in this Assembly must at all times be the subject of comment, and when the leader of a party objects to this House adjourning on the birthday of the Queen's son on account of the existence of a motion the effect of which is to place in power certain gentlemen with whom the name of the honorable gentleman is linked, I think we are justified in commenting upon that.

Mr. McLEAN.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable gentleman surely cannot discuss matters which are so entirely irrelevant to the motion before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I thought I had made myself clear upon that point. I have already said that irrelevant matters had been introduced, and that I did not know where to stop their introduction. I cannot rule the honorable gentleman out of order if he disregards the ruling I have given.

Sir G. GREY.—I think, Sir, some latitude should be allowed in a discussion in which the honorable member for Egmont has accused me of defying the House.

Major ATKINSON.—No. 8 will settle that.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If members of the House will bandy offensive words one against another I cannot put a stop to it. The House must itself interpose. I do think the remark made by the honorable member for Egmont has given a latitude which every honorable member has a right to claim. If accusations are made, they will of course be replied to in one form or another; and when I am called upon to call one honorable member to order I must remind other honorable members that if they will throw stones they must expect stones to be thrown at them in return. The honorable member for Egmont has done this. Now, I ask the House to pause before it arrives at such a state of animosity that it will be impossible for me to restrain the feelings of the House. I hope the House will not consider these remarks uncalled for.

Sir G. GREY.—I rise to a point of order. While you were speaking, Sir, the honorable member for Egmont made a most insulting and improper remark to me across the House.

Major ATKINSON.—I made no insulting remark. I said, "No. 3 would settle that."

Sir G. GREY.—I consider that a most improper remark.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is just as well that we should understand where we are. I do not desire to hear any of these aside remarks; but I must say that I consider the remark of the honorable member for Egmont exceedingly unparliamentary and improper. If the House does not think it its duty to support the Speaker it had better say so. The House may depend upon it that I do not desire to occupy this seat without its support, and I now inform the House that the remark of the honorable member for Egmont was exceedingly improper.

Mr. BARFF.—The statement made by you, Sir, must appeal to the feelings of all members of this House. There may be a few turbulent spirits present; but I believe three-fourths of the House will support you in your ruling, and you may feel thoroughly convinced that it is satisfactory to the House.

Mr. W. WOOD.—While I say, Sir, that the House generally supports you loyally in the difficult position you fill, I also think that it will become necessary to make better provision to restrain certain honorable gentlemen who lately occupied prominent positions in this House, and compel them to abide by your ruling. I should like to know whether it is too late to take any steps in regard to a circumstance which occurred in the House a few days ago. I mean, when certain honorable members of the House defied your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not the question now. I may state at this time that the Speaker is armed with sufficient power to resist those who defy him, and the present Speaker is determined to wield that power if necessary. It is well that I should state now that I shall not continue to occupy this position if I am to be defied while I am performing my duties to the best of my ability. I am now speaking in the interests of parliamentary government, and I hope the House will take in good part what I have said.

Mr. REES.—When I was interrupted I was about to say that the honorable member for Egmont has distinctly stated, as a ground why the House should not adjourn, that his motion to the effect that the House has now no confidence in the Government was on the Order Paper; and, when he was greeted with derisive cries of "Hear, hear," from certain honorable gentlemen, he taunted those honorable members with paying no respect to the House. I should like to ask who it is that the honorable member for Dunedin City, and others who cried out, do not respect. You can hardly be called upon to respect persons who act as some honorable members of this House have acted. The motion for the adjournment is a reasonable one. The House is not in the habit of sitting on holidays, though I believe that last session we did sit on two or three Saturdays in the latter part of the session. I believe that twice during this session the House adjourned because evening parties were taking place at the houses of Ministers; and yet we find the ex-Premier refusing to pay this token of respect to the son of his Queen. I believe that the motion of the honorable member has only been tabled for the purpose of taking up time. He can easily repeat the motion next session, and I can assure him that I do not think he will have an opportunity of discussing it this session. The honorable members on the Opposition side of the House seem to think that the Government and their supporters are children; but they are greatly mistaken if they think that we will allow them to discuss their motion this session. Honorable gentlemen on this side of the House are quite prepared to remain here, if necessary, in order that they may be enabled to carry on the business of the country, despite the efforts of the other side to impede it. I hope the House will pass the motion for adjournment.

Mr. THOMSON.—Sir, I think the motion of the Premier is an extremely reasonable one. To-morrow is the anniversary of the birth of the Prince of Wales, and in my opinion it would not be right for the House of Representatives to sit on that day, for by so doing they would not show their loyalty in the way that all Englishmen are in the habit of doing. If the Provincial Councils were in existence now, I believe they would not sit on the Prince of Wales's birthday. There are two things that Englishmen glory in—namely, fair-play and loyalty. In these colonies people are more loyal than they are in England. The Native Minister has stated that if the Government were allowed to go on with the business the session would soon come to an end. Yesterday a great deal of business was cleared off the Order Paper, and if we had gone on in the same way to-day a good deal more of the business would have been cleared off. It would be much more profitable to do this than to go on arguing the question whether or not we ought to sit here to-morrow. The Government themselves intend to be very busy to-morrow. They hoped to be able to so arrange matters that all the public business of the country would be disposed of by next week. We certainly shall not sit to-morrow if we consult the interests of the country. All public institutions, including the schools, will be shut; and what will be said in the mother-country if it becomes known that this House of Representatives was sitting? What is the argument that has been advanced? That there is a certain motion coming on to the effect that this House has no confidence in the Government. Now, that is just the very motion that has been occupying the attention of the House for the last fortnight or three weeks, and if we take it up again and discuss it we shall simply be beating threshed straw, which is very unprofitable work indeed. I cannot believe, Sir, that those honorable gentlemen will be allowed to get back to these benches. They certainly did not acquit themselves so very well when they did occupy them that we should allow them to get back again to them. If they had guided the House properly when they had the chance, the session might have been closed two or three months ago. And I expect that if they were back again on these benches they would be doing just the very same things that they did before—bringing down Bills, throwing them on the table of the House, allowing everything in their Bills of any value to be thrown out, and doing neither one thing nor the other. To meet to-morrow would be very unprofitable.

Mr. BARFF.—It appears to me that the honorable member for Egmont might have another object in view than that which he has expressed as influencing him in bringing forward Motion No. 3. It has occurred to me, and doubtless to other honorable members, that the honorable member for Egmont is simply anxious to apologize for his conduct on a former occasion. It is not many days since we saw that honorable gentleman standing up defying Mr. Speaker, declining to sit down when he was told, clawing the air as if he imagined he saw ghostly cobwebs around him, and generally producing a very theatrical effect. It occurred to me that the honorable gentleman might have seen the error of his ways, and be desirous of offering a full and ample apology to Mr. Speaker and to the House. Although in a discussion like this there may be a considerable amount of latitude allowed after what has been said by the honorable member for Egmont, still I do not think it is wise to indulge in any personalities with regard to honorable gentlemen who have not taken part in the debate. What might have appeared to be something like an insinuation in regard to the honorable member for Avon was thrown out by the honorable member for Auckland City East when he was alluding to what, in plain words, might be called political apostacy. I am certain the honorable member for Avon does not intend to apostatize in any matter whatever, because I have more confidence in that honorable gentleman than to believe that he would deliberately say one thing one day and a totally different thing the next. I am the more convinced in this opinion, because I heard that honorable gentleman, at a meeting of his own party not very many weeks ago, thus advise. He said, "All you have to do is to take the course which I shall adopt—that is, notice which lobby Major Atkinson goes into with his party, and go into the other." When an honorable member gives expression to such a statement as that—many honorable members now present heard it—I cannot for a moment believe that he will go back from his word, particularly when I know that nothing has occurred since to alter the position of affairs, except a certain amount of factious opposition and obstruction on the part of the honorable gentlemen who are now trying to raise a discussion on a very unimportant matter indeed. It appears to me that the proposition for an adjournment is only a reasonable one. I remember that, some years ago, when I was in Victoria, the people there loyally celebrated the Prince of Wales's wedding-day, and in Melbourne three days' holidays were observed. Throughout the colonies it has always been the rule to make the Prince of Wales's birthday a public holiday. Even upon the diggings, although many honorable gentlemen connected with pastoral pursuits might think a diggings population very inferior, the Warden invariably proclaims a public holiday in a case like this, even where it is not provided in the rules and regulations of the gold fields. The peculiar line of conduct adopted by the Opposition, both since they have been in opposition and when they were on the Ministerial side of the House, has been such as to prevent myself and many other active members of the House from taking a single day for recreation. Their conduct has been of that description that many honorable members, who would have been better in church or chapel, have had to stay about the lobbies to try to circumvent the peculiar manoeuvres which the Opposition endeavoured to work in order to carry out their objects. I think it is only fair that we should have a holiday, particularly as, in all probability, judging from the present action of the Opposition, we may be here until Christmas.

Mr. MURRAY.—I think the Premier would have been very remiss and wanting in proper loyalty if he had not moved the adjournment, so as to enable us to show respect to the future King of England. And the honorable member for Egmont would have acted more gracefully had he seconded, as leader of the Opposition, the motion of the Premier, and shown, by sinking all party feeling in a matter of this sort, that he was not inferior to that honorable gentleman in loyalty.

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I think it comes with very bad grace from the honorable member for Egmont to oppose this motion. He has been a soldier, and has sworn allegiance to Her Majesty in that capacity and as a Minister of the Crown, and should not now object to a proper expression of our loyalty. This is an instance such as he is in the habit of giving us. His conduct throughout the whole of this session has been anything but becoming to his position; and I feel very much grieved to think that a gentleman who has held the position of head of the Government, and who has represented the Crown in this House, should oppose a motion to loyally observe as a holiday the birthday of the future King of England.

Question put, "That this House at its rising do adjourn until Monday at half-past two o'clock;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

KYEBURN HUNDRED.

MR. DE LAUTOUR asked the Minister for Lands, If any steps have been taken by the Waste Lands Board of Otago to frame regulations for the depasturing of stock on the Kyeburn Hundred? This hundred had been proclaimed as far back as two years ago, and for fully eighteen months it had been more or less taken up, so that there were at present about 13,000 acres taken up out of a total of about 17,000 acres. Under the Act it was the duty of the Waste Lands Board to frame regulations, so that the grazing rights might not be monopolized by the pastoral tenants without their paying anything to the Crown. The Board, however, for reasons best known to itself, had always refused to give to the settlers of this hundred their grazing rights. Six months ago the Board refused to issue the depasturing licenses which must be held before grazing rights can be exercised. At the instance of the late Premier, the Board was informed that their action was irregular; and they then issued regulations. He now wanted to know whether, during that six months, they had learned that during the two years previously they had been neglecting their duty in not issuing pastoral licenses. If no steps had been taken to frame regulations, he hoped the Government would restrain the action of the Board, so that the settlers might have in their own hands, after the 1st December, that which had been refused to them at the instance of the Board.

VOL. XXVII.—9.

Mr. MACANDREW replied that he found that the Waste Lands Board was giving public notice, calling attention to the necessity of Wardens being elected before the 1st December next, for the purpose of regulating the depasturing of stock on the hundred. Failing such elections taking place, the Board would itself frame regulations.

MANGAHOE FISHING RIGHTS.

Mr. TAIAROA asked the Minister for Native Affairs,—(1.) By what authority Europeans exercise fishing rights over the Mangahoe Inlet, in the Provincial District of Otago, while the Native title thereto has not been extinguished? (2.) If the Government will cause a stop to be put to such acts on the part of Europeans until some arrangement for the extinguishment of the Native title has been made? The inlet referred to was situated in the midst of his land. The lands adjacent to the place had all been granted, and an application was also sent in for an investigation into the title to this inlet. The Native Affairs Committee recommended that the case should be heard before the Native Land Court, and application was sent in; but the hearing had not taken place. The Europeans were in the meantime plundering all the oysters and fish from the place, and selling them in Dunedin; and the second part of his question asked that a stop should be put to that proceeding, until the Native title was extinguished. The Natives were not receiving any benefit from what was obtained from the place, but were remaining quiet until the matter was settled, while the Europeans were getting all the advantage.

Mr. SHEEHAN replied that, as the honorable gentleman was no doubt aware, under the Treaty of Waitangi certain rights were reserved to the Natives in regard to their fisheries. It was quite true that two years ago the Native Affairs Committee recommended that this case should be heard before the Native Land Court; and the only reason why the hearing had not already taken place was that there was a legal difficulty in the way, as the Court held that, under a certain clause of "The Native Reserves Act, 1873," it could not hear the case. There was, however, a Bill now before the Upper House which would remove the difficulty if it became law, as no doubt it would; and then the honorable gentleman could bring his case before the Court in the ordinary way. He did not know by what right the Europeans complained of took fish from this inlet, but the Government had no power to stop them. If the honorable gentleman proved his title to the property, he could bring an action against the people in the ordinary Courts, and restrain them from the trespass of which he complained.

FEATHERSTON AND MASTERTON RAILWAY.

Mr. BEETHAM asked the Minister for Public Works, If the Government are in a position to call for tenders for carrying on the formation of the line of railway from Featherston to Masterton; and, if not, whether they will state what is the earliest date at which tenders can be called for?

Mr. LARNACH replied that plans of this line were in progress, and, if the direct line was adopted, tenders might be called for in a month. If, however, the line by Greytown was adopted, three months would perhaps have to elapse before the tenders could be called for. When the plans were further advanced a report would be made of the relative merits of each line.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. REES, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he did not know whether the sum named would be sufficient to secure the due representation of New Zealand at the Paris Exhibition, but he had placed the motion on the Paper more for the purpose of drawing attention to the fact that no provision had as yet been made, that the time for holding the Exhibition was rapidly drawing near, and that, unless New Zealand was to be the only colony of the Australasian group to be unrepresented, it was high time the necessary steps to secure its representation were taken. It was evident that means must be provided for the transmission and return of exhibits to and from the colony, and it was also evident that the House should pass some resolution in order to enable the Government to provide funds for the purpose. It might not be out of place to show what grounds might be urged for the expenditure of public moneys on a proposal of this sort. They heard continually inside and outside the House that large amounts of money were being spent not in strict accordance with the Public Works and Immigration policy, which was inaugurated in 1870. They also knew as a fact that, even before the inauguration of that policy, frequent charges of log-rolling were made—charges of votes being obtained for different and diverse purposes, simply as a reward to one member who voted for the local works of another member, works which were not of sufficient importance to justify their being made a charge upon the public funds. The motion related to a purpose very different from that. It was a purpose in which the whole colony was concerned, and one to which a small sum of money might very profitably be devoted, because it would tend to bring New Zealand more before the French people and other Continental nations than any other step that could be taken. The Great Exhibition of 1851, the idea of which was not originated by Prince Albert, although it was very successfully carried out by him, was instrumental in securing one very great step in the pacific history of the world. He was sorry to say that he did not think there was much hope of such an exhibition exerting much influence upon such nations as those engaged in the barbarous conflict going on in the East; but he did think that international exhibitions, by bringing about an interchange of ideas, and by bringing together representatives of the earth's communities, whole families of nations, as it were, would do more towards putting down wars in days to come than anything else that could take place. They had already had that effect to a very great extent. He believed that the feeling which was germinated by the Exhibition of 1851, and the subsequent exhibitions held in various parts of the world, had done a great deal towards averting a war between England and America. It gave rise to a feeling which led up to the Geneva Conference—a process of arbitration which, though costly, was far preferable to an appeal to arms, with its consequent destruction of thousands of valuable lives. Since that time the value of these exhibitions had become more and more apparent to all civilized nations. The original idea of holding national exhibitions was attributed to Mr. Whishaw, Secretary to the Society of Arts. It was said in Haydn's "Dictionary of Dates" that Prince Albert had proposed the Great Exhibition of 1851. They all knew the outcome of that Exhibition. A Royal Commission was appointed in connection with it on the 3rd January, 1851. The Queen subscribed largely towards it, and it was opened on the 1st May following, and continued open for a long period of time. He believed that on one day 110,000 people visited it. From that time to the present, the influence that was exerted by that Exhibition and others which had followed in its train had been felt all over the world, and it had tended to make communities great and prosperous. At that Exhibition there were exhibited agricultural implements, every kind of mechanical appliances, all modern improvements in steam engines; and, in fact, all the branches of science and art received a great impulse from that Exhibition and others which followed in its train. He was sorry the late Ministry had not paid more attention to this question, inasmuch as it was well known to the Government that space had been granted by the Commissioners of the Paris Exhibition—at the request of the Government, he believed; but yet the Government had not taken the slightest trouble to arrange for filling that space. At nearly all the other great exhibitions New Zealand had been very worthily represented. He found that at Vienna numbers of medals and certificates of honorable mention had been awarded to New Zealand exhibitors, and to the New Zealand Government. He held that it would be a public calamity if the space that had been allotted by the Commissioners of the Paris Exhibition were not filled up, for he believed that the French people intended to make it the grandest exhibition yet held in the world. At the Philadelphia Exhibition, also, the Colony of New Zealand was well represented. The people who flocked from all parts of the United States to Philadelphia were able to mark the progress of the human race in regard to arts and science, and they were able to see how, year after year, England, the United States, the British Colonies, and, in fact, all the communities of the earth, were going on, step by step. The question had lately been raised in the public Press as to why the Government of New Zealand had omitted to provide the necessary funds for the payment of the expenses of persons who might desire to become exhibitors. The Australasian Colonies as a whole would certainly be largely represented; in fact, he believed that nearly all the other colonies had appointed Commissioners to represent them at the Exhibition; and he heard that the late Government had gone so far as to name an honorable member of the House to represent New Zealand. It was generally supposed that, if the honorable member for Egmont succeeded in carrying the present motion of want of confidence in the Government, and got back to office, Mr. George McLean was to be appointed Commissioner for New Zealand. He (Mr. Rees) hoped that the honorable gentleman would not be very much chagrined at not having received the appointment. At the same time, he trusted that, though the honorable gentleman might not be appointed as the Commissioner, old colonists in France would see him among the visitors at the Exhibition. In no way could the colonists of New Zealand display their wealth, or show the progress the colony was making, better than by having themselves properly and ably represented at these exhibitions. He believed that at no very distant date there was to be a great exhibition in Victoria, and it was not improbable that the Prince of Wales would be present to open it. The colonies of Australasia at the present time were nearly as populous as, and twenty times more wealthy than, the American States were at the time of the War of Independence, one hundred years ago. He found that in 1876 the population of this group of colonies was, in round numbers, about 2,400,000, while the population of the United States, at the time of the War of Independence, was about 3,000,000. Of course no parallel could be drawn regarding the tonnage of the vessels and the numbers of the live stock belonging to the Australasian Colonies and to America. The position of the colonies could be set forth in no better way than by making a fair exhibition of their products and showing their various capabilities at such exhibitions as the one referred to in his motion. He had no doubt that the other colonies would be very well represented at the Paris Exhibition, but it remained for this colony to do its part. He thought that, owing to the laxity of the Government, the people were not at all alive to the importance of sending exhibits to France. He believed that when the Vienna, the London, and the Philadelphia Exhibitions were opened, the people in those places were far more ready to bestir themselves in regard to obtaining exhibits from New Zealand than even the people of the colony themselves were. The people were careless because the Government had not taken the trouble to inform them that all the necessary expenditure would be borne by the colony. He was informed that, unless something were done very soon, the space allotted to New Zealand by the Commissioners of the Paris Exhibition would be covered with a large screen, on which would be printed the words "New Zealand." He thought the Government should take some active steps to aid the people of the colony in sending exhibits to the Paris Exhibition. The Government ought to encourage the people of New Zealand to send to Paris specimens of the mineral and metalliferous deposits of the colony—the iron, the coal, the timber, the flax, and the articles which were manufactured here: specimens of all these things ought to be sent to the Exhibition, for they had excited the admiration of the American people when they were shown at the Philadelphia Exhibition. The Government ought to encourage the people of the colony to send exhibits to Paris, because it was highly probable that such a thing would be of advantage to the colony. As he had shown a few nights previously, the colony had during the last five years spent about £25,000,000, and in that time the debt of the colony had been increased by £14,000,000, and, unless men of means—professional men, merchants, and others who had capital—were induced to come to the colony, the burden would press very heavily on the shoulders of the present colonists and their children. The colony would not progress unless men were induced to come to it other than those who were now being brought out at the public expense. Persons of means should be induced to emigrate to New Zealand, and they would be so induced if the natural endowments and commercial capabilities of the colony were placed before them in an attractive light. If that were done, the different classes and grades of men in the old country and on the Continent of Europe would have some inducement to come and help the present colonists in the great work of colonization. He believed that that was far better. He believed, for instance, that a course of public lectures given throughout the United Kingdom; that an exhibition of New Zealand manufactures and products, a publication of climatic tables, and, although they had not a very favourable specimen in Wellington, a lecture given on the newspaper Press of the colony—which was always, to a certain extent, an indication and token of the prosperity of a people—these things, if they were brought prominently and publicly before the eyes of different classes of men—of the general public, in fact—would do more to induce a healthy stream of immigration to this country than the expenditure of one and a half or two millions of money, which they had to a very great extent wasted during the last five years. It was well known, as a matter beyond dispute, that a large proportion of the immigration which had been introduced had not added to the wealth of the country at all. He believed it was an absolute fact that some of the very best of the newly-imported immigrants, as well as some of the bone and sinew of the country, the stay of the country, the old colonists, had been gradually, during the last twelve or eighteen months, floating away from New Zealand to the other colonies of Australasia. They did not envy the other colonies their welfare and prosperity; they did not envy them when they heard, as in the case of New South Wales, that they had a balance of millions at their banks; that labour was high, work abundant, provisions cheap, and taxation, instead of being heightened as in New Zealand, being lowered; but they said that it was a sin for the Government of the country to expend the public money in inducing immigration, and at the same time not to have lands for the people to settle upon, not to have employment for them to engage in, but simply to pay for their passages in order that they might go to and enrich the other colonies.

They should so act as to induce a stream of immigration that would settle in the country, take deep root, and become as much a part and parcel of the Colony of New Zealand as they were themselves. This could be done by placing our circumstances properly before the people of the United Kingdom and the people of some of the Continental nations. Hitherto this had been done to some extent, although he believed it might have been done to a still greater extent. He believed, for instance, that those who represent us at Home, the gentleman who was called the Agent-General, might well have advanced the claims of New Zealand to some extent publicly before the people. He noticed lately that Sir Julius Vogel, the Agent-General, had been writing in papers, but he failed to see that in so writing to papers he had been advancing the interests of the colony he represented. The same energy, the same skill, and the same talent employed for the purpose of placing before the public of the United Kingdom the claims of the colony he represented would have been of vastly greater benefit to us, and, in fact, to the people at Home whom he was addressing, than the articles which that gentleman had contributed to the "Contemporary" and some other papers and magazines. In fact, he might say, in passing, that he was rather surprised to see that a gentleman who represented this country at Home as Agent-General, who was the leader in this country of all liberal institutions, who was looked upon as the leader of a great party—a democratic party, in fact—for the purpose of advancing the liberties of the whole inhabitants of this country—he was surprised to find that he should have so far departed from that line of principle as to hint, in an article which he wrote in the "Contemporary Review," that the proper bond—or at least the advisable bond—between England and her colonies was to be enforced even at the expense of civil war. It would be a calamitous thing for the colony to take that tone. Such peaceful contests as the competitions at these exhibitions would prove the strongest bond which could possibly bind us to the older countries. At this time they needed whatever help they could obtain from the influx of inhabitants and the expenditure of capital in the country, not by way of loan or anything of that sort, but as an investment in the country itself. There was abundance of idle money in England—money which could not be lent out at any proper rate of interest—there was a superabundance of population; and if the claims of New Zealand were properly represented—in common, of course, with the claims of the other colonies of this group—he believed that to a large extent the streams of population and of wealth which had been flowing from Great Britain to America during the last thirty or forty years would be pointed in this direction; and that, instead of paying for the introduction of people by thousands and tens of thousands into this country, they would be able to induce persons to come—persons not of one class, but some of whom would take up the position of labourers and some the position of employers of labour, so that the colony would not be deluged with one class of immigrants, but would have all classes fairly represented. It would be a very long time before the gradual settlement of the hordes of immigrants who had been poured into this country irrespective of their capacity and irrespective of their fitness for the work they were called upon to engage in: it would be a long time before the different classes of the community would be as wealthy and as wealth-producing in the future as the same number comparatively were in the past, for in the past the people settled down gradually to their existence; they settled down to their proper positions, the poorer classes gradually working up to an independence, and, to some extent, no doubt, the rich becoming more wealthy. But the introduction of between thirty thousand and fifty thousand of one class—a class absolutely dependent upon its daily earnings for its daily bread—must do much to lower the average power of the whole population to produce wealth. It needed very little knowledge of political economy to be able to state that. And, as a consequence, what did they see at the present time? Although an enormous amount of public money has been spent—although millions of money from the Land Fund had been spent—extra aids, as it were, to the general producing and wealth-spending power of the country—although these enormous aids had been in progress during the last three years, the revenue of the country had absolutely not increased. He was reminded that to some extent it had decreased. The population had increased; and, in 1870, when the great Public Works policy was launched, there were long tables made showing that with the increase of population the revenue was bound to increase—"sure to increase," Sir Julius Vogel said, and everybody received the assertion as gospel. Why, members of that House might have seen then that if they introduced a vast number of people they must introduce them exactly of the same level of wealth, the same level of intelligence, the same average power of producing wealth and paying revenue as those whom they came to join. If the thirty thousand or forty thousand immigrants who had been introduced had been people of wealth, and had settled down in the country, the revenue, no doubt, would have largely increased, and to a larger extent than the proportionate numbers would be equal to. But it had not been so, and all the immigrants who had been introduced had been persons of the poorer class. As a natural consequence of that, the revenue had not increased; and, until the immigrants gradually settled down and took up the same relative standing and position that the people had before they came into the country, the revenue would not increase. But, irrespective of this, he believed that that which they could offer to immigrants was sufficient in itself to tempt men to come into the country and settle. There were yet boundless lands tolerably easy of access. Everywhere the sea-coast was tolerably near; and the public works had no doubt made accessible large tracts of public lands which would otherwise have been difficult of access.

New Zealand was acknowledged, he believed, by all those who had taken the trouble to study the subject, and by those who had written and spoken upon it, in point of climate, fertility of soil, and easiness of access, to offer advantages, to men who made their home in this country, which perhaps none of the other colonies possessed or offered to intending immigrants. But they might easily admit this: that the voluntary immigration into the country during the last four or five years had not been carried on to such an extent as it ought to have been. They had had a great number of Government immigrants, but not the same number of voluntary immigrants as they had before at any period in the history of New Zealand. If any honorable gentleman would study the figures in relation to immigration, he would at once be struck with this fact: that, since the Government immigration commenced in 1871 and 1872, voluntary immigration into New Zealand had not maintained its former average by a very considerable margin; and the reason for that was not very difficult to find. It was this: that persons with capital, and even persons without much capital, but with sufficient to start them in a new country, had become rather afraid not only of the introduction and expenditure of so much borrowed money, which had to be repaid, but of the introduction of such very great numbers of Government immigrants. They were afraid of undue competition. They were afraid that all the avenues to success would be filled up—that the field of labour would be closed, in fact; and in other colonies they might hope to have a better outlet for their money or for their labour than they would have under the existing state of things in New Zealand. Now, if New Zealand were not properly represented at Paris there was no doubt that this feeling would be increased. The colony was at present looked upon by the steadiest and the gravest authorities in England with some degree of suspicion in relation to the enormous sums of money which had been borrowed and expended, and in relation to the general haziness which had existed about our public accounts during the last three or four years. Private letters to honorable members and to prominent citizens in the colony, public statements in "Fraser's Magazine," in the Times, and in other papers, articles published in the Economist, all showed that the people of the United Kingdom did not regard the colony at the present time with that degree of satisfaction and with that degree of certainty and trust of the monetary and financial position of New Zealand to which this colony was entitled. The reason for this was not difficult to find. It was this: that the late Government, in order to bolster up its credit, in order to be enabled to obtain in the London money market a position which it desired to occupy, so that it might float further loans, had, to say the least of it, made the condition of affairs very hazy indeed, so hazy that, both within and without New Zealand, it was continually said that nobody knew exactly how the colony stood; and the very last telegram that was sent Home, the telegram which was placed on the table of the House in relation to the state of the country—a synopsis, as it were, of the Financial Statement made by the late Treasurer—stated that everything was satisfactory, and that there was a surplus of £143,000. Why, the English brokers, the people connected with the English money market, knew better! There were honorable members present who had received letters from persons at Home who said they could not understand how such a statement could possibly have been sent from New Zealand. Yet that was telegraphed Home, and it was publicly given as an authentic statement of our financial affairs, although honorable members of this House objected to it. They said that New Zealand could stand without having any misstatements made, without having any haziness cast about it; that New Zealand, from its resources, from its natural wealth, from the energy and industry of its people, and from its being absolutely certain to grow and increase in numbers, wealth, and power, could easily bear, with proper administration, the burden it had to bear, without any resort to exceptional means for the purpose of raising a fictitious credit in the English market. When this was stated, those who stated it were immediately accused of decrying the credit of the country, and of attempting to depreciate the value of existing securities. It was not so long ago since the statement was made that five millions of money would require to be borrowed. What was the result? Why, the honorable member for the Taieri immediately got up and denied it, and stated that it was not so. The honorable member for Egmont immediately afterwards got up and said that it was so—that five millions would have to be borrowed, and most likely a good many more millions. Then the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Hunter) got up and said that five millions would not be borrowed—that the persons who said so were entirely under a mistake. And yet the late Premier stated that the figures were all in the Financial Statement, and distinctly stated that it was absolutely necessary for the credit of the country that five millions of money should be borrowed. Why not allow the true position of affairs to be seen and known? It was not that the colony was not wealthy enough and powerful enough, and had not great resources. Look at the revenue! Although it was true to the eye and not true to the spirit that the revenue was £3,400,000, including the Land Fund, that was far more than the current expenditure of the country. There was no doubt of that. He had never made a secret of his opinion that the Land Fund was the property of the colony, and not of the provinces. He believed that, if a proper system of finance in that respect were brought down, and the true position shown, the country would not suffer in any way. He would not object to a moderate property-tax being put on, so as to make both ends meet, and place themselves in a position of independence. The people were not afraid of their liabilities. He believed that if the true position were known in London, as he hoped and trusted it would be known at the present time, the New Zealand bonds, instead of the 5 per cents. being of less value than the 4 per cents. of New South Wales, would fetch a higher price than any others in the world. They should make the best possible appearance they could at the Paris Exhibition. He believed that even £20,000 would be well spent in showing what the resources of New Zealand absolutely were—in showing those resources at the Paris Exhibition, which would attract the attention of Continental countries and of the people at Home. They would receive good notices in the English papers, which would tend to show the products, wealth, and power of New Zealand. Tables might be prepared showing the nature of the climate and the fertility of the soil, which would be of great value as indicating to persons at Home what a country New Zealand was as a future home for settlement. They might well spend £20,000 instead of £3,000 in putting those matters properly before visitors to the Paris Exhibition, and before the people of the Continent of Europe. It would benefit the country to the extent of fifty times the outlay; it would give value to property in this country, and act as an inducement to persons to come to New Zealand. This was not, therefore, a mere idle matter, and if a little time were taken up in considering such a subject, both inside and outside the House, he was sure it would result in a great deal of public good. He thought it would be far more to the public good than putting on the Order Paper any number of motions "That this House has now no confidence in the Government." If this motion which he had now brought forward were carried out, it would be a very proper way of getting on with the business of the country. It would be an advantage to every man engaged in mercantile pursuits; to every man who had property and something at stake in the country; to every man who had a family to rear up, and to see it helping to take part in the common weal of the country. He had heard honorable members use the argument that there had been a considerable waste of time in talking to and fro, but he would ask of what value were representative institutions, and of what value could they be to a free people for the purpose of improvement, if they were not to be considered as instrumental in facilitating freedom of speech? And why? Representative Assemblies did not meet simply for the passing of laws, simply for the making of certain Statutes. Let them take the last four or five years. In the making of the laws now on the Statute Book during the last four or five years, more time had been wasted than in all the discussions and recriminations in this House ever since it was founded. Laws were passed which imposed burdens, which took up time, the action of which had been complained of by the people—laws which had to be repealed, and the meaning and signification of which was not known or understood. They were not useful in their operation, and certainly the time spent in discussing and passing them was not spent in doing the business of the country. They were of a description which did not lay the basis on which a great and free Government might be erected—a Government which would have for its end and aim the greatest happiness of the whole people affected by it. Recrimination in one sense was useful. Of course no man had a right to allude to private matters, and he trusted the House would put its foot down decidedly and strongly against that; but if a man were accused in public of having misused his public power, of having by unfair means advantaged himself or his friends, or neglected the interests of others, then those public accusations were the very means that would tend to keep pure the fountain of public justice. They had heard accusations from side to side of the House. They had heard them made against the late Ministry and their friends; and how were they met? By refusal to appoint Committees to examine into them. When accusations were made against the present occupants of the Ministerial benches, how were they met? They were met with a determination to expose everything that could be exposed, and to cover those who made the accusations with contumely, shame, and ridicule. He would say that all that was good. He defied a single member to say that the recrimination which had taken place in this House during the last two years had not been productive of great public good. Men had been shown out in their true character, so that the people had been able to judge for themselves; the people in all parts of this colony, and in all parts of the whole of these colonies, had been able to judge of the character of those who had been spoken of. He would be very sorry indeed if men were prevented from speaking the truth through fear of infringing what were called the polite rules of society and of this House. There never could be a more unhealthy and stagnant state of things than when men were afraid to tell the truth and to call things by their proper names—when men were afraid to speak their mind lest they should tread on the toes or touch a sore place of a rival. This House would not be doing its duty if it countenanced such a state of things. He could mention instances—and there were one or two honorable gentlemen who could bear him out—in which the characters of members of this House had been aspersed, and aspersed in private—in which statements had been made that members of this House had been guilty of conspiracy to defraud the Government. That accusation was made in private. The signatures of persons in the community were put to such charges, and the papers were carefully put away in the pigeon-holes where no one could see them. A species of assassination of that sort was to be guarded against. It was not an open charge made upon any foundation whatever. He had stated the purpose for which he had moved this motion, and he trusted it would be carried. He hoped there would be an expression of opinion upon it—that honorable members would speak to the resolution. It might be said that there was a great scarcity of public money. So there might be, but the sum of £3,000, or a great deal more, would be well spent by this House and the country in carrying out the object of the motion he now proposed. Then it might be said, "Oh, it is not much good; we are not very well known in Paris, and it would not be of much use." But that bore on the face of it its own answer. If they were not known as a great colony like New Zealand ought to be, there was the more reason for carrying the object of this motion into effect, and the more likely were they to insure success. Then there was a need for this to show to all classes of men, and especially to the public creditor, that New Zealand was what she was represented to be—a rich land, and a land which offered perfect security for the money that might be borrowed. This was particularly necessary, as the colony had again to go into the money market to borrow, and the more we showed to the people at Home that the country had great resources in itself the more easily and the more economically could we get the money we wanted. More money must be obtained to complete the public works and make them succeed, and the more thoroughly we exposed our affairs to the light of day the more readily should we get that money. The confidence of the English people had been largely decreasing. It had been growing in inverse ratio, and decreasing, while it had been increasing in regard to other colonies. There could be no doubt, however, if we acted straightforwardly and showed what our resources were, that a reaction would set in, and our credit would gradually and surely grow instead of decreasing. He hoped there would be an exhibition in New Zealand before long. He did not see why other colonies should have exhibitions, and New Zealand be shut out; and there was no reason why, within a few years, the Government should not be well supported by the country in having an exhibition in New Zealand. Other colonies would be delighted to send exhibits and give us their support in the matter. Although that would cost a great deal more than £3,000, he had no doubt it would be carried out. In the meantime, however, what the House had to do was to see that steps were taken to have the colony properly represented at the Paris Exhibition. If the Government took the first steps in the matter, the people generally would soon take it up. He was afraid he had occupied too much time in speaking to the subject, and he would like to hear the opinion of other members. He hoped the vote would be carried, and that no time would be lost in taking efficient steps to insure success. The colony would never regret the expenditure of this money if it were devoted to enabling New Zealand to make a creditable show at the Paris Exhibition, and to take such a position as this colony, although one of the youngest, was entitled to, alike in consideration of its past, its present, and its future.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on Wednesday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider of a respectful address to be presented to the Governor, praying that His Excellency will cause a sum of £3,000 to be placed upon the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of providing funds for the due representation of New Zealand at the Paris Exhibition."—(Mr. Rees.)

Mr. DE LAUTOUR would like to congratulate the honorable gentleman for the stirring and practical appeal he had made in regard to New Zealand. It would have been very advantageous, however, if this question could have been raised under happier auspices. It was a subject of sufficient magnitude to have demanded that the Government, at an early stage of the session, should have invited the attention of the House to it. He did not altogether agree with the views put forward by the honorable gentleman, and in the few minutes at his disposal he thought he would have time enough to show those points on which the honorable gentleman had laid himself open to criticism. The honorable member had taken one view regarding exhibitions—that was, exhibitions external to New Zealand—and the view he held was the position New Zealand might take in the Paris Exhibition. But a much wiser and a far better mode for a young country to utilize such an exhibition as that at Paris would be for the young country to avail itself of the exhibits of the old countries. He thought that, so far as possible, in spending money with regard to exhibitions in the Old World, the colony ought, as it were, to send out its eyes—that was to say, persons should go out and gather in, bring back, teach, and instruct our artisans and the young men who were to be raised in New Zealand. The honorable gentleman put too much weight upon the impetus that our credit might receive from any exhibits that up to this time could be sent Home, and the great economic gain that would ensue from sending articles to the Paris Exhibition; but the real economic gain would result from sending out our eyes to gather experience from what could be learnt in the Old World. He would like to see this money, if granted, utilized not in sending a philosophical savant to the Exhibition, or in sending the late Commissioner of Customs there, for neither one nor the other would be able to use his eyes with sufficient advantage to the colony. What he would like to see would be ten or twelve persons engaged in industries already established here sent Home to learn experience. That was the course taken in England in 1867, when the Society of Arts voted £1,000, and, through the agency of Mr. Mundella and others of that gentleman's class of occupation, picked out eighty foremen and representative working-men in all kinds of industries of the most importance to the commercial prosperity of Great Britain. They brought back reports, which were published. Of the first edition 2,500 copies were sold, and it was afterwards translated into French, at the request of the Emperor himself, and was now the chief text-book of manufactures in France. Although New Zealand could not accomplish so much, still, if an intelligent man were sent, say, from the Mosgiel establishment in Otago, another from one of the shipbuilding establishments of Auckland, and others from other industrial establishments, of which there were many in the colony, and if they reported on the exhibits at Paris of special industries which were likely to be developed in New Zealand, it would add very much to the capital of this colony at an early date. Of course subjects of this sort opened up questions of very great importance, and chief amongst these was the technical education of our people. In that lay the great strength and value of such exhibitions as that about to be held in Paris: indeed it was for that purpose they were held. Hitherto many countries had been unable to formulize such an education, and they had been compelled to trust to these spasmodic exhibitions for instruction, while other countries, wiser in their generation, were educating systematically. That was one great reason why the House should agree to this motion, and he thought all honorable members would agree that the amount of gain the colony would achieve would be of greater importance in that way than would result from showing our own wealth. There were special industries which it might be hoped would be developed in this colony. There was, for example, the iron industry. No doubt in many parts of the colony there were large and extensive deposits of iron ore which as yet the colony had not been able to turn to such great advantage as could be wished; and the specimens from Taranaki shown last year in the library of the Assembly should be an encouragement to send some person to the Paris Exhibition to gain experience in the working of that metal. Again, the utilizing of wool should be a special object with any Commissioner, whether workman or savant, sent to Paris. This brought him to an argument used by the honorable gentleman which he did not quite follow, and by which the honorable gentleman seemed to imply that a diminution in our exports necessarily showed that we were not progressing as rapidly as we should hope. He contended that a great object of a young country should be to develop its own helpfulness. It was not at all desirable that its exports should be swelled year by year, but rather that it should work up its own raw material. To his mind the colony might be prospering to a very great extent although the imports were increasing and the exports decreasing. Through the colony retaining its raw material, and working it up itself, a great saving might be made to the people, and a real addition to the capital of the colony. He thought the internal savings of the people of the colony, those which each man was accumulating in his own sphere, were too much overlooked when honorable members were arguing as to the prosperity of their own country in comparison with others. He had already pointed out the great object which might be gained by sending men to the Paris Exhibition with the view of instructing themselves, so that they might afterwards educate the working-men of the colony in industrial science. He might now say that, although there were men in this colony, as in every country, who could afford to be ignorant of many things, still the workmen, on whom the prosperity of the people of the colony as a nation must depend, could not afford to be deficient in that education which was necessary to make their skill productive. It had often been said, and all honorable members were aware, that many thousands of immigrants had been brought into the colony. He only touched upon this matter to point out that, although a great many of them were artisans, still, taking the percentage of artisans as high as could be, it could not be expected that the very best workmen in the different branches of manufactures would come out here, and yet these were the only men who could be looked to as teachers of industrial science to the young men of the colony. It must be presumed that these men were not at the top of their special industries at Home, or they would not have left there. If the question of technical education in industrial science was not attended to, it would be necessary to depend upon the apprentice system, and, unless means were taken to obtain fresh instruction, the colony must in this respect fall back year by year. That had been found from the former Paris Exhibition to apply especially to England. It was now admitted, from comparative observations of the Exhibitions of 1851, 1862, 1867, and also the Philadelphia Exhibition, that countries which had neglected to send out their eyes, so to speak, to gather up and bring back information, had fallen back and were getting behind other countries in the manufacturing industries of the world.

The hour of half-past five o'clock having arrived, Mr. SPEAKER left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Major ATKINSON.—I beg to move the postponement of all the Orders of the day, with the view of proceeding with the want-of-confidence motion which stands in my name.

Mr. O'ROURKE.—I may be allowed to point out that that cannot be done. When the time comes for calling on the Orders of the day they must be called on. The order of business for the day cannot be interrupted except by general consent. The Standing Orders are very explicit on this subject. I am sorry to interpose, but I feel that a duty is cast upon me in some respect in consequence of the position I hold in this House. I yesterday endeavoured to make myself master of all the rules and authorities relating to this point, in the expectation that I might be called upon, in your absence, to temporarily occupy the position you hold. The 71st Standing Order is to this effect:—

"When the House proceeds to the Orders of the day, on days on which Orders have precedence, and after the notices of motion have been disposed of on all other days, or on the House resuming at half after seven o'clock, as the case may be, Mr. Speaker is to direct the Clerk at the table to read the Orders of the day, without any question being put."

Then, if you turn to May, page 261, the course of procedure is laid down in an equally explicit manner:—

"When the Clerk is proceeding to read the Orders of the day, the course of business may not be interrupted by any other business or debate which members may endeavour to interpose. So soon as an Order of the day has been read, the business to which it relates is to be immediately proceeded with; and the Speaker, therefore, will not permit any question to be put to a Minister or other member, unless it relate to such Order of the day."

And at the conclusion of the paragraph there is this passage:—

"When an Order of the day has been read, the Minister or member having charge of the Bill or proceeding is entitled to priority in making a motion concerning it, and no other member will be allowed to interpose, unless with his consent."

Now, in regard to giving precedence to a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry by a postponement of all other business, I contend that that can only be allowed by means of a concession on the part of Government. The practice is thus stated with regard to postponing the Orders of the day:—

"Facilities of this kind are conceded by Government according to the importance and urgency of the motions to be discussed and the state of public business. They have generally been given to motions amounting to a vote of want of confidence in Ministers, but not to Bills of independent members which, if carried in opposition to Ministers, would probably cause their resignation; for, if such a principle were admitted, the arrangement of public business intrusted to them would be taken out of their hands."

Mr. STOUT.—If the honorable gentleman is allowed to bring on his motion I presume I shall also be allowed to bring on the adjourned debate upon my motion relative to the position of the Governor.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to call your attention, Sir, to what I believe to be the correct method of procedure. I maintain that it is competent for any honorable member, before the Orders of the day are called on, to move the postponement of such Orders of the day as the House may think fit; but that cannot be done after the Orders of the day have been called on. That has invariably been the practice of this House. Upon reference to May, page 244, it will be found that it was the custom of the English Parliament, up to 1856, to postpone each Order of the day separately as it was put, but since that time it has been the custom to postpone as many Orders of the day as might be necessary, in order to arrive at a particular Order. I have at hand one precedent, and I have no doubt many others may be found. In the session of 1872, all the Orders of the day were postponed, in order that the House might proceed to the discussion of a want-of-confidence motion. This was not done by permission merely. The words I find in the Journals of the House are, "It was ordered" that this should be done. I submit that it is perfectly correct to postpone all the Orders in the way I propose.

PRIVILEGE.

Sir G. GREY, by command of His Excellency the Governor, laid certain papers upon the table, and they were read as follows:—

Message.

"NORMANBY, Governor.

"The Governor regrets that he is unable to give a definite reply to the address presented to him by the House of Representatives announcing the concurrence of the House in the report of a Select Committee appointed to search for precedents and to report to the House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, 'That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as a reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House,' because, in the course of a correspondence which has taken place between himself and the Government, which correspondence he now presents to Parliament, a question of constitutional law has arisen, which the Governor considers it is absolutely necessary should be submitted for the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies before he can take upon himself to accept the resolution passed by the House of Representatives.

"The Governor begs to assure the House that he does this out of no disrespect to their decision, but simply in defence of what he believes to be a most important constitutional principle.

"If the Governor should be wrong in the conclusion he has formed, he can assure the House that nothing was further from his intention than in any way to trench upon their privileges.

ENCLOSURES.

No. 1.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR to the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B.

"The Governor presents his compliments to Sir George Grey, and requests that he will have the goodness to lay the accompanying message before the House at the earliest opportunity.

Message.

"— Governor.

"The Governor acknowledges the receipt of an address from the House of Representatives announcing the concurrence of the House in the report of a Select Committee appointed to search for precedents, and to report to the House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, 'That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as a reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House.'

"The Governor begs to inform the House that he has forwarded the same to his Constitutional Advisers, and that, as soon as he has received the advice of his Ministers, he will forward his reply to the House of Representatives.

"Government House,

No. 2.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR to the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B.

"The Governor requests that Ministers will forward to him their advice as to the answer which he should return to the enclosed address from the House of Representatives.

"The Governor is sure that he need not point out to the Government that it is desirable that the reply should be given with as little delay as possible."

"Government House,

(Enclosure in No. 2.)

"ADDRESS from the House of Representatives to His Excellency the Most Honorable the Marquis of Normanby, a Member of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, Knight Commander of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor of New Zealand, &c., &c., &c."

"May it please your Excellency,—The House of Representatives of New Zealand, in Parliament assembled, desire respectfully to acquaint your Excellency that, having taken into their consideration a memorandum of your Excellency, dated the 27th day of October ultimo, in reference to the appointment of Mr. J. N. Wilson to the Legislative Council, and which memorandum was communicated to the House on the 31st day of October ultimo, by your Excellency's command, they have agreed to the following resolution, which they desire may be communicated to your Excellency:—

"That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as the reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House."

"WILLIAM FITZHERBERT, Speaker."

"5th November, 1877."

No. 3.

The Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B., to His Excellency the GOVERNOR.

"Ministers respectfully advise His Excellency the Governor to return the following answer to the address from the House of Representatives:—

"The Governor, from a resolution transmitted to him in an address from the House of Representatives, learns that he has infringed the privileges of that branch of the Legislature. The Governor trusts that, from his unintentional act and his proceedings in relation thereto, the benefit may result that a precedent will have been established which may be useful in future."

"G. GREY."

"5th November, 1877."

No. 4.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR to the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B.

"The Governor has received the memorandum in which Sir George Grey, on the part of the Government, tenders to him their advice as to the answer which he should give to the address from the House of Representatives; and the Governor must request that the Government will reconsider that advice, for the following reasons, viz.:—

"1. That constitutionally it is the Government, and not the Governor, who are solely responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor.

"2. That, if the memorandum of the Governor to his Ministers on the subject of the appointment of Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council did contain any breach of privilege, it was, in the first instance, a strictly secret and confidential communication between the Governor and his Constitutional Advisers, and, if they saw that the Governor had unintentionally in any way infringed upon the privilege of the House, it was their duty, under the oath which they took as Executive Councillors, to have pointed out the fact to the Governor, when he would most readily have reconsidered the answer which he had given.

Sir G. Grey

"3. That the presentation of the paper was done solely on the advice in writing of Sir George Grey, and that, therefore, Ministers are solely responsible."

"NORMANBY."

"Government House, Wellington, 5th November, 1877."

No. 5.

MEMORANDUM from the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B., to His Excellency the GOVERNOR.

"Ministers respectfully acknowledge the receipt of His Excellency's memorandum of last night. The points raised in it are of such importance as to require the most careful consideration upon their part, and they are, therefore, unable immediately to tender advice to His Excellency upon the subject.

"Ministers will, however, take care that no unnecessary delay occurs in bestowing that attention upon the Governor's memorandum which its importance demands."

"G. GREY."

"Wellington, 6th November, 1877."

No. 6.

MEMORANDUM from the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B., to his Excellency the GOVERNOR.

"His Excellency having asked Ministers for a reply to his memorandum relative to the advice they offered to him as to his answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives, Ministers beg respectfully to state,—

"1. That they admit their responsibility for His Excellency's acts when done on their advice.

"2. That out of respect for His Excellency they refrained from offering him any further advice, when he had twice rejected that which they had given him; but they do not think that, in refraining from doing so, they committed any breach of the oath which they took on entering office as Executive Councillors; and they feel sure that, on a re-perusal of that oath, His Excellency will modify his opinion on that point.

"3. They admit and accept the responsibility of laying the papers before Parliament; but beg respectfully to point out that the resolution of the House does not say that that proceeding was a breach of its privileges.

"Ministers are, however, unwilling to press His Excellency to accept advice upon a matter of this kind with which he does not fully concur; and therefore they respectfully beg to advise that the enclosed message be substituted for that previously sent to him."

"G. GREY."

(Enclosure in No. 6.)

"The Governor has received the resolution of the House of Representatives, by which he is informed that he has inadvertently committed a breach of the privileges of that House. The House is constitutionally the guardian of its own privileges.

"The Governor having now called Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council, in accordance with his promise to his Advisers, he does not think it will answer any useful purpose to discuss the question any further, but he will transmit the papers to the Secretary of State for the Colonies."

No. 7.

MEMORANDUM from His Excellency the GOVERNOR to the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B.

"The Governor acknowledges the receipt of Sir George Grey's further memorandum of this day's date, and he is glad to learn that the Government agree with him, and admit their constitutional responsibility to Parliament for the acts of the Governor when done on their advice. The Governor, however, cannot admit that their responsibility should be so limited, because, if the act of the Governor is such that the Government cannot accept or defend it, it is their duty to resign, in order that the Governor may be able, if he can, to form a Government who would support his views, in which case he would have, of course, to justify his conduct to the Secretary of State, to whom alone he is responsible. In this present instance the Government, and the Governor thinks rightly, did not consider that his refusal to appoint Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council was a matter of sufficient importance to induce them to resign, and thereby they accepted his decision and became responsible for his act; and the whole question should have then ended, or they should have further pressed their advice upon him.

"Neither can the Governor modify the view which he has expressed, that the Government were, by the oath which they took as Executive Councillors, bound, when they saw that he had unintentionally given reasons which might be construed into a breach of privilege, to have pointed out the fact to him.

"The appointment or non-appointment of Mr. Wilson was one thing, and totally different to the question as to whether the Governor had unintentionally infringed the privileges of the House.

"The Governor has for too many years held a seat in one branch or other of the British Parliament to wish for one moment to infringe upon the privileges of the House of Representatives; and, could he admit, that he is the person responsible to Parliament, he would not for one moment hesitate to express his regret that most unintentionally he had infringed their privileges.

"The Governor, however, considers that the constitutional principle for which he contends—namely, That Ministers, so long as they retain office, are alone responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor—is of such vital importance to the future good government of the colony, and for the position held by Her Majesty's Representative, that he feels that he would be recreant to his duty, and utterly unworthy of the position which he holds, if he permitted the question to drop, and did not try, to the utmost of his power, to have the matter finally and definitely settled.

"This question of privilege is now no longer a matter 'in agitation or debate' in the House. The Governor has been informed officially by the Hon. the Speaker of the decision of the House, and the official reports of the House are officially before him. He can therefore now refer to the matter in his communications with his Ministers without any fear of committing a breach of privilege.

"The absolute responsibility of Ministers to Parliament for the acts of a Governor is a question which has so often been decided, and is so well understood in England, that the Governor did not expect to find it disputed. The necessity and justice of this rule is obvious. In working out mathematical problems it is not unusual to demonstrate the point by showing the absurdity of any other conclusion, and the Governor would venture in this case to prove his point in that way. As an illustration, he will take the case which has just occurred. The Governor refused the advice of Ministers to appoint Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council. By his instructions, and according to numerous precedents, he had a perfect right to take that course. The Government, as he thinks rightly, did not consider it a case of sufficient importance to necessitate their resignation, and there the matter would have ended. The Governor was not obliged to give any reasons to his Ministers for the course he had taken, but he thought it more honest and more respectful to them to do so. Unfortunately, in doing so he used expressions which were afterwards construed into a breach of privilege. The Government either did or did not see this. The Governor is perfectly ready to assume that they did not, as he should be very sorry indeed to impute to them any intention of entrapping him: at the same time the Government must have had some reasons for wishing for the production of the papers, and so little did the Governor see any public necessity for it that he was on the point of refusing his consent, and only refrained from doing so because he did not like for the second time to refuse their advice. The papers were laid on the table of the House, and immediately the question of privilege was raised. "The Governor, by the privilege of the House, was not supposed to know what was going on. He had no voice in the House. He was not in any way allowed to explain his conduct, or to produce evidence or precedent in his favour. He could not employ counsel; and the Government, by whose advice the papers were published, and who are his constitutional defenders in the House, either took part against him, or remained in silence and refused him their assistance.

"The Governor was condemned unheard, and an address was presented to him by the House expressing its disapproval of what he had done.

"A criminal, on the other hand, no matter what crimes he may have committed, is, in the first place, by the English law, presumed to be innocent. He is brought face to face with his accusers. He is present at his trial. He may produce evidence of his innocence, and employ counsel; and even before sentence is passed he is permitted to urge any reasons that he may think fit, in mitigation of his sentence.

"The Governor would ask whether these two cases do not prove incontestably the absolute necessity for the constitutional rule which the Governor contends does exist—namely, That it is the Government, and not the Governor, who must, so long as they remain his Advisers, be solely responsible to Parliament for his acts. Is it not absurd to contend that Her Majesty's representative should be condemned unheard, and that he should be put, as to his defence, in a more unfavourable position than that in which the worst criminal in the colony could possibly be placed?"

"This question as to the extent to which Government are responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor is one which cannot possibly be decided in the colony. The Governor has, therefore, decided to forward the whole case for the consideration and decision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, by whose decision he is bound to abide; and he will have much pleasure in forwarding, at the same time, any representations that the Government may wish to make.

"If the Governor has urged his case somewhat strongly, he begs that Sir George Grey will clearly understand that he looks upon it simply as a political and not a personal question, which he is bound to press to the best of his ability, though, he trusts, without the slightest exaggeration.

"As regards the answer to the House of Representatives, the Governor proposes to send a message something to the effect of the one he encloses.

"In conclusion, the Governor would wish to state that, in reply to a telegram from himself, he has heard from Sir Hercules Robinson that a precedent, which appears very nearly similar, did occur to Lord Belmore, and that his action was approved of by the Secretary of State.

"The Governor wishes to place no stress upon this information, as he has not been able to find the case, and does not know how far it may be parallel; but it is his intention, if the case has been published, to request Sir Hercules Robinson to furnish him with a copy as soon as possible.

"NORMANBY.

"P.S.—Unless the Governor hears that Sir George Grey wishes to make any further remarks, the Governor proposes to send his message to the House of Representatives this evening.

"N.

"Government House,
Wellington, 8th November, 1877."

No. 8.

"MEMORANDUM FOR HIS EXCELLENCY.

"Ministers respectfully represent to the Governor that the questions which they have had to consider were—Can the Governor, finding that a notice of a vote of want of confidence in the Government has been given, decline to take the advice of his Responsible Advisers on the ground that such a vote is pending? and, Was he justified in holding that he could not accept their advice until the decision of the Assembly on that vote had been given? If such is the constitutional law, nothing is necessary but to raise successive votes of want of confidence in the Government to enable the Governor to act for long periods of time without Responsible Advisers.

"Ministers respectfully state that they cannot admit that the Governor is responsible to the Secretary of State in this matter; nor can they admit that the question as to the extent to which Government are responsible to the Assembly for the acts of the Governor is one which cannot be decided in New Zealand. On the contrary, they feel it to be their duty respectfully to protest against the points at issue being decided anywhere else, unless the consent of the General Assembly is obtained to the reference of those points to some external authority. The Secretary of State for the Colonies is also, in their opinion, for such a purpose, an authority unknown to the Constitution of New Zealand.

"Ministers would respectfully solicit the attention of the Governor to the 32nd section of the Constitution Act, from which it will be found that the words 'General Assembly' comprise His Excellency the Governor himself, who is by law a constitutional part of that body.

"Ministers respectfully add, that they have already advised His Excellency regarding the message they think he should return to the address of the House of Representatives, and they have nothing to add to that advice.

"G. GREY.

No. 9.

MEMORANDUM from His Excellency the GOVERNOR to the Hon. Sir GEORGE GREY, K.C.B.

"The Governor acknowledges the receipt of Sir George Grey's further memorandum of this day's date, and he would point out that the Secretary of State is the only constitutional channel through whom the commands of the Crown are conveyed, and who is responsible to the British Parliament for the advice he may give to Her Majesty; and as the Governor, at any rate, feels bound to obey the command of Her Majesty, whom he has the honor to represent in this colony, he still maintains that it is his duty to submit this case for the consideration of the Secretary of State.

"The Governor has referred to the 32nd section of the Constitution Act, to which Sir George Grey has called his attention, and he would point out that it simply places the Governor, as Her Majesty's representative, in exactly the same position as regards the Parliament of New Zealand as that which is held by the Queen as regards the Parliament of England.

"The Governor must adhere to the determination which he has announced to the Government, and will lay the whole correspondence before Parliament this evening; and by next mail he will forward the whole case for the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

"NORMANBY.

"Government House,
Wellington, 8th November, 1877."

Mr. STOUT.—I do not know whether I should be in order in moving that the message and memoranda now read be referred to the same Committee of Privilege, with the view of ascertaining what position this House should take up. It would be proper for the House to say whether it would be right to refer this case to the Secretary of State rather than that it should be dealt with by the House itself. I ask you, Sir, whether, this being an important question of privilege, and as the mail goes out soon, I shall be in order in moving that the message and memoranda be remitted to the same Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think it would be better if the honorable member were to give notice of motion.

Mr. STOUT.—I would merely point out that Standing Order No. 246 provides for a case like this. It says, "Mr. Speaker shall, unless a previous message be then under consideration, immediately read the message to the House, when, if necessary, a time shall be fixed for taking the same into consideration." Therefore I apprehend that I should be now in order in moving that the message be taken into consideration at a certain time. I put the question to you, Sir, whether or not I should be in order in so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the Standing Order to which the honorable member has referred corroborates the view I suggested—that a time should be fixed.

Mr. STOUT.—Then, Sir, I shall move that a time be fixed. Before I conclude my observations, I shall move that the time fixed be to-morrow at half-past two o'clock. I only wish to make a few short remarks on this subject. It seems to me that the questions that have been raised in the memoranda submitted to the House are of a most important character. The question assumes a far larger phase than I imagined it would assume when I first brought the matter under the notice of this House. It is now not only a contest, if I may use the term, between the Governor and this House, but it seems to me that the Governor is anxious that this House should enter into a contest with the Home Government. There was nothing further from my intention than that the matter should be brought up in this manner. I have no desire that there should be a contest between this House and the Home Government; but I consider it my duty as a colonist, and as the representative of a constituency of the colony, to stand up in defence of the rights of the colonists when those rights are being invaded. It seems to me that they are now being invaded, because the position which His Excellency takes up is this: that whether he has or has not committed a breach of the privileges of this House can only be settled by the Secretary of State. I would like to know who he is! We have nothing whatever to do with the Secretary of State. He is not our representative, and he is not responsible to us. The Imperial Parliament having once granted to us a Constitution, until that Constitution is removed we have a right to be governed under the laws we ourselves make. The only position that can be taken up, the only constitutional position, is that when this Parliament—and by the word "Parliament" I mean not only this House, but His Excellency the Governor himself and the two Houses—when they pass laws, then the constitutional position is that the Queen may or may not assent to them. It seems to me a most unheard-of thing that this Parliament and its privileges are to be at the dictation and the arbitration of a Secretary of State living in London. The thing seems to me perfectly monstrous. You cannot say that you have a Parliament at all if it is to be said for one moment that this sort of thing is to be permitted. Then another large question is raised in these memoranda, and it is this—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understood the honorable gentleman was only giving notice. The time for making any remarks is when the honorable member brings forward his motion. He is only now intimating that he will do so—that a certain time should be fixed for considering this matter. I would point out to the honorable gentleman that it would be more in accordance with the usages of this House if he would defer making any remarks on this question until he brings forward his motion.

Mr. STOUT.—I was moving that a certain time be fixed, and not merely giving notice. Of course I might move that the question should be taken up to-night if the House requires it. I shall not debate the matter, as you have hinted that I should not. I will only mention another aspect, and I do so now for this reason, and not with the intention of debating it: that, when the message comes to be considered, honorable members, I hope, of all shades of political feeling in this House, will see the importance of the matter that they are discussing. The other point I will mention—I will not comment upon it—is that it seems to me the Governor has assumed a position which is at variance with constitutional government—namely, that the Ministry's sole duty is to support his views; and what the Parliament's views may be seems to be of little importance. As you have decided that I should not debate the matter further, and as I always desire to bow to your ruling—not like some other honorable members—I shall say no more on the subject, but simply move now, That the message and the memoranda from His Excellency be printed and taken into consideration to-morrow at half-past two o'clock.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I think we shall scarcely be able to consider this matter to-morrow. The papers will hardly be printed to-morrow. I would suggest whether it would not be better to take the discussion on Monday. I would move, That the word "Monday" be substituted.

Mr. REES.—I trust the House will consider it to-morrow.

Mr. STOUT.—The amendment has not been put.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I do not wish to press it.

Mr. BRANDON.—The question in dispute is not one between the Governor and this House. It is a question relating to the position of Ministers towards the Governor; and it is impossible to consider the matter properly within the short time the papers will be in our hands.

Mr. BARFF.—The question is one that should be considered at once, or to-morrow. I may state that the Standing Orders and the practice of the House of Commons distinctly point out that a matter of privilege, which is also a matter of urgency, may be taken into consideration forthwith. Without any notice of motion it would be competent for any honorable member of this House to ask that a matter of privilege should be thus dealt with. I would like to ask any of those honorable gentlemen who object to this being considered a matter of urgency, whether they are prepared to deny that, at any particular time between now and, say, Tuesday—in all probability, before a result was come to by the Committee, Tuesday evening might arrive—I would ask honorable members who differ from me whether the mail steamer might not leave New Zealand, carrying with it the despatches of His Excellency the Governor and taking Home with it no reply from this House. We are drawing towards the close of the session, and it is our bounden duty to vindicate the course we have adopted by a very large majority of the members of this House. It is our bounden duty to allow both sides of the question to be heard. I altogether decline to agree to the proposal of the honorable member for Avon, as I do not wish to see His Excellency's despatches sent Home without our reasons being given on the other side.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I understood that the honorable member for Avon was about to move, as an amendment, that the question should be taken into consideration on Monday instead of to-morrow, and I think that it would be well to adopt that course. I do not look upon these memoranda of His Excellency's as in any degree placing himself in antagonism to this House. He has simply said that if he has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House it has been through inadvertence and unintentionally; and he says, moreover, that it is the duty of his Ministers in this House to defend him, if necessary, upon the consideration of a question of this kind. If, however, his Ministers say that it is no part of their duty to defend the Governor, we can clearly understand the position of the matter. If Ministers, or any one of them, now get up and say that they do not intend to undertake the defence of His Excellency, or to take part in the discussion in the capacity of His Excellency's Advisers, we can understand the position; but, if we are invited to enter into a conflict with His Excellency by appointing a Committee to send a further expression of opinion to him, we should be discussing in Committee, not whether or not a breach of privilege has been committed or whether we should take some further measure to bring His Excellency on his knees to explain his conduct, but whether His Excellency has taken that course which he is justified in taking with regard to his Constitutional Advisers, and whether they stand in the position in which gentlemen who are His Excellency's Advisers should stand before the people of this colony. I have no hesitation in saying that the position which those gentlemen occupy in reference to this question is not altogether nice. They have a manifest and plain duty to perform as regards His Excellency. They are his Advisers, and, as His Excellency says, they are quite as responsible as he is for what has appeared on the table of this House as emanating from His Excellency. If His Excellency did consent to lay on the table of this House the memoranda in which, through inadvertence, there was language which this House has properly conceived to be a breach of its privileges, the other party to those memoranda is equally responsible to this House; and I do not hesitate to say that Ministers, in laying those memoranda on the table, were guilty of disrespect to the House. That is the opinion which I have held upon the subject from the commencement, and which I have expressed upon every possible occasion except in my place in this House. I now say that I consider the position which the honorable gentlemen on the Treasury benches occupy in that respect is quite as disrespectful to this House as, if not more so than, that which His Excellency the Governor, through pure inadvertence, has happened to occupy. (Oh, oh!) No doubt honorable members may groan. It is probably difficult for some intelligences to detect the nice distinction between that which is due and that which is not due as between gentleman and gentleman in matters of this kind. But, Sir, there are plenty of honorable members in this House who do know the difference between that which is due and that which is not due as between gentleman and gentleman on such occasions. I can quite appreciate the spirit in which that groan is given. It is the spirit in which the whole proceedings on one side of this House—not the side on which I am speaking—have been conducted: it is the side of the honorable gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches. I say that a more transparent and patent trap was never laid to catch a gentleman occupying the position which His Excellency occupies in this colony; and I now again assert, as I have said to many honorable members, that it was the duty of Ministers, when they received the message of His Excellency which contained matter that gave occasion to the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) to treat His Excellency's message as a breach of the privileges of this House—I say, if they had been actuated by that honest feeling which Ministers ought to possess towards the gentleman they are advising, they should at once have pointed out to him that his language might be deemed to contain a breach of the privileges of Parliament, and that in all probability that language might lead to some collision between His Excellency and Parliament. But there is nothing more common in the course of party politics than that which is so common in one species of hunting—namely, the dragging of a red-herring across the trail. They were trying to drag this across the vote of want of confidence by bringing His Excellency into collision with the House. The result has been to bring about a thoroughly contemptible condition of things on the part of the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches—a position contemptible, Sir, and from which—(Order, order)—

Mr. Brandon

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Sir, I have three times attempted to make my voice heard, but have been unable to do so. The point of order I meant to raise is whether the honorable gentleman has a right to use the word "contemptible" in regard to any honorable members of the House. (Oh, oh!) When honorable members have the decency to be quiet, so that I can be heard, I shall continue to put my question. The point of order on which I desire your ruling, Sir, is whether the honorable member, after hurling all sorts of accusations against the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches, which accusations were quite irrelevant to the question, is entitled to use the word "contemptible" towards them. I ask your ruling, Sir, because no doubt upon that ruling will very much depend the tone of the debate that must follow.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think some of the terms used by the honorable member were very strong, but it does not necessarily follow that they are unparliamentary. It is, however, very difficult to decide absolutely, because the same terms and expressions when used in one tone of voice convey a very different impression from what they would do if uttered in a different manner. Such expressions can only lead to recrimination, and my advice to the honorable gentleman would be not to use such strong expressions.

Mr. BARFF.—Speaking to another point of order, I would ask whether the honorable member for Wellington City is justified in calling himself a red-berring, and saying that he was dragged across the scent.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I am justified in calling myself what I like; but I do not know what I should call the honorable gentleman if I spoke my mind. Sir, I regret that I should have used any language which was calculated to draw from you even a suggestion of reproof: such a thing is far from my desire. I did not apply the term to the honorable gentlemen on the Treasury benches. I spoke of the position which this matter has assumed in the House. I will, however, withdraw the term, and use "unfortunate." I say the position is unfortunate, and was an unfortunate one as between Ministers and the Governor, and it was an unfortunate position from which they should remember they were to a large extent lifted by the action of this side of the House. I myself, looking upon the passage in His Excellency's message which has been the subject of discussion in the House as a breach of its privileges, willingly took part in the discussion of the matter, moved for a Committee to consider it, took part in the discussions of that Committee, and brought up a report. The speech which I addressed to the House in moving the adoption of that report was characterized by proper and temperate language; and the House, by a large majority, concurred in the report. The course which was then taken was calculated to save the honorable gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches a considerable amount of embarrassment; but they did not take advantage of the position in which they were placed by that course. There were three courses open to them, one of which they took, which they should not have taken.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I would ask your ruling, Sir, whether the honorable gentleman is not opening up the whole debate. I should like that to be thoroughly understood, for, if the honorable member is allowed to proceed, I, for one, must consider that the question is fully before the House, and can be discussed from first to last.

Mr. STOUT.—I appeal to the honorable member for Franklin to allow the honorable member for Wellington City to finish his remarks, as I shall then be entitled to reply to him.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I have not raised the question. (Oh, oh!)

Mr. SPEAKER.—A very large question has no doubt been raised, but I put it to the honorable member, whether it is wise to enter into the discussion of it now. It is not, however, for me to stop him—that is a matter for his own judgment; but, so far as his being in order is concerned, he is so. At the same time, the remarks which I ventured to make to the honorable member who moved the motion are, I think, applicable to the honorable gentleman, and I hope will be borne in mind by honorable members who may enter into the debate. If the House enters into a debate now on a question that it is proposed to discuss to-morrow, we shall have two debates, and there will be a waste of the public time.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I do not want to waste the public time, Sir. I have not been discussing the question proposed to be discussed to-morrow—namely, the further course this House should take with reference to the question of the breach of its privileges. I was not discussing the question of privilege at all. I consider it was closed by the correspondence of His Excellency, in which he has stated that, if he has committed a breach of the privileges of the House, he has done so inadvertently. The question which I understand His Excellency intends to refer Home is not merely a question of privilege, but the question of the constitutional relations between himself and his Constitutional Advisers. His Excellency's message is as follows:—

"The Governor regrets that he is unable to give a definite reply to the address presented to him by the House of Representatives announcing the concurrence of the House in the report of a Select Committee appointed to search for precedents and to report to the House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, 'That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as a reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House,' because, in the course of a correspondence which has taken place between himself and the Government, which correspondence he now presents to Parliament, a question of constitutional law has arisen, which the Governor considers it is absolutely necessary should be submitted for the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies before he can take upon himself to accept the resolution passed by the House of Representatives."

of the breach of privilege to the Secretary of State. He is going to refer to the Secretary of State the question of constitutional law which has arisen between himself and his Advisers. Honorable members may say "No, no," but I accept unreservedly the statement His Excellency makes in his message to this House, and I certainly do not think this House is prepared, when His Excellency makes a statement of that kind, to receive the denial of any honorable members of this House on that point. His Excellency has stated what he proposes to do. He says, "The Governor begs to assure the House that he does this out of no disrespect to their decision, but simply in defence of what he believes to be a most important constitutional principle." He is not referring to the question of privilege as between himself and this House; he is referring solely to the question whether or not his Ministers, sitting in this House, are or are not obliged to take one of two courses—either to resign, because his Excellency declines to accept their advice, or to take upon themselves the duty of defending His Excellency in this House, he having no other representative here. That is the question that he is about to refer to the Secretary of State. A careful consideration of the correspondence will show that His Excellency, before giving a definite answer to the resolution of this House, wishes to obtain the opinion of the Secretary of State upon an important constitutional question. I was not in any degree discussing the question of privilege, and I conceive that a proposition to refer this message to the Committee which formerly decided the question of privilege is in no degree appropriate to the occasion. I will go no further with my remarks. I will conclude by proposing, as an amendment to the motion of the honorable member for Dunedin City, That the consideration of His Excellency's message be taken at half-past seven o'clock p.m. on Monday.

Mr. REES.—I do not intend to enter into the consideration of the main subject itself; but I should like to point out that the honorable member for Wellington City has absolutely misstated the meaning of His Excellency's message. The meaning is not what he states it to be. It is a message which passes by His Excellency's Constitutional Advisers altogether. It has nothing whatever to do with them. It is a distinct reference to this House, and to nobody else. It says this:—

"The Governor regrets that he is unable to give a definite reply to the address presented to him by the House of Representatives announcing the concurrence of the House in the report of a Select Committee appointed to search for precedents and to report to the House in relation to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Stout, 'That the action of His Excellency the Governor, in noticing a matter in agitation or debate in the House as a reason for refusing to accede to advice tendered by his Ministers, was an infringement of the privileges of the House,' because, in the course of a correspondence which has taken place between himself and the Government, which correspondence he now presents to Parliament, a question of constitutional law has arisen, which the Governor considers it is absolutely necessary should be submitted for the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies before he can take upon himself to accept the resolution passed by the House of Representatives."

That has nothing whatever to do, even in a remote degree, with the relations between the Governor and his Ministers. It is a question between the Governor, as representing the Crown, and this House, as representing the people. The Governor distinctly says—and I wonder how any honorable gentleman could attempt to put any other construction upon the words—he distinctly says that he is unable to give an answer to the resolution of the House until he has referred the matter to the Secretary of State—that his Constitutional Advisers have nothing to do with that. I suppose we can only attribute the honorable gentleman's action to-night to the cause, whatever it may be, which makes him state one thing to-day and a totally different thing to-morrow. There is hardly a debate which takes place, hardly a week passes by, in which the honorable gentleman does not blow fiery-hot to-day and icy-cold to-morrow. Why, Sir, upon this very question the honorable gentleman stated in the Committee exactly the opposite of what he has stated to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is not in order in referring to what took place at the meetings of the Committee.

Mr. REES.—It was the honorable gentleman who moved in this House for the appointment of the Committee. It was he who selected the members, being one himself. He was the person who brought up the report. He was the person who moved that the address should be presented to His Excellency. Why, then, does he now say that this is a matter between His Excellency and his Ministers? He moved that the question should be referred to His Excellency for his answer; and, now that the Governor says, "I will not receive your address; I will refer it to the Secretary of State," the honorable gentleman says it is a deliberate trap laid for His Excellency the Governor. Did he say that when he moved the adoption of the report? Not at all. He said an offence was committed when His Excellency took notice of matters in agitation and debate. Then the honorable gentleman was right; now he is wrong. He is like a person who is ready to put a thing up with his right hand and knock it down with his left. Sir, it has been pointed out by all historical writers of modern times—men like Mr. Goldwin Smith, and others of equally high standing—that there are always to be found connected with colonial institutions, especially around Government House, a class of persons who will never see anything except with the eyes of officialism; that, either through some courtesy shown to them or some favouritism—whether a thing proposed to be done is right or wrong is a matter of perfect indifference to them—they are always prepared to stand up for the rights of Royalty as against the rights of the people. We could not have had a better illustration of that than we have had to-night. When the matter was fresh, when the honorable gentleman appealed to the more ingenuous portion of his nature, he stated that the question was one entirely between this House and the Governor; but now the old feeling has come back upon him he absolutely speaks of the position of Ministers as contemptible because they take up the position he took up two days ago.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I stated that the very first resolution submitted to the Committee, which was proposed by Mr. Stout, was to this effect: "That this Committee do not consider it necessary to proceed to investigate the fitness or unfitness of Mr. Wilson, nor as to any difference of opinion between His Excellency and his Ministers not affecting the privileges of the House." That was carried.

Mr. REES.—And in the Committee a proposal was made by the honorable member for Cheviot that the question should be opened up again, so that Ministers might be censured. Mr. Stout also proposed that it should be opened up again, in order that Ministers should be censured, if necessary; and the honorable gentleman voted against it. Yet he comes down here, and in a simulated tone of indignation—

Mr. TRAVERS.—It was not in the order of reference.

Mr. REES.—I should like to know whether it was in the order of reference that the honorable gentleman should take up one position one day and come down the next day and take up another. Why, Sir, if the honorable gentleman and his "affinities" had the best reputations ever possessed by political men their conduct during the past fortnight would have torn those reputations to tatters. Nobody need ever be surprised at the position which the honorable gentleman takes up at any time, because we can never tell when his language has got the bit in its teeth, as it were, and his words are running away with him. The honorable member forgets the words he uses, and it is not at all surprising, therefore, that he should take up one position to-day and another to-morrow. Sir, the meaning of the Governor's message is distinct and clear. I do not intend to enter into the consideration of the constitutional question, but I may say that I warned those honorable members of this House who were members of the Committee that, if they carried a certain resolution which they wished to carry, the result would be that they would set in motion principles and actions which they would not be able to stay, and that they would be lighting a fire which would consume things they did not know of. I think we ought to consider this matter at once. The message means that the Governor considers it his duty to lay his hand on the privileges of this House, and that he will only regard the privileges and liberties of this House as they are laid down to him by the Secretary of State. Sir, if that principle be admitted we may as well tear the Constitution Act to pieces and scatter it to the winds. If we are to be at the mercy of the Secretary of State we have no Constitution whatever.

Mr. BRANDON.—I should like to know whether the honorable member is not travelling outside the question.

Sir G. GREY.—Rising to a point of order, Sir, I may say that I hardly understand the question raised by the honorable member for the Wellington Country District. Most serious accusations have been made against myself and my colleagues, and, as the whole question was discussed by the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), I apprehend that honorable gentlemen on this side of the House should be allowed some latitude.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There is no doubt that this debate is drifting into the state of which I warned the House.

Mr. REES.—I would not have spoken if it had not been for the intemperate language used and the gross accusations made by the honorable member for Wellington City against Ministers and their followers in regard to this matter, and I should have thought that the honorable member for Wellington Country District would have seen the drift of my arguments. I was urging that this matter should be considered at once, irrespective of party feeling. There ought to be but one party in relation to any question of this sort. All differences ought to be sunk here. On such an occasion as this we ought to stand upon one common platform, and calmly consider what our duty is in relation to the people. I believe this is about the greatest question that has ever come before any Colonial Parliament. We are now set face to face with the question whether we are to be governed by the Constitution which the Imperial Parliament gave us, or whether we are to be at the mercy of any Secretary of State who may be temporarily in office at Home. This is a question which concerns the people to the greatest possible extent. The honorable member for Wellington City has referred to this as the most deliberate trap that ever was set. Where is the trap? If there is any trap the honorable gentleman himself set it. I shall not at present enter into any comparison as to the respective merits of the Governor and the Government. The question must divide itself into two parts—first, the constitutional position of the representative of Royalty and his sworn Advisers; and, secondly, the position of the Governor as the representative of the Queen and this House; and I think it will well become the House, after giving the matter full consideration, to finally determine those questions. I think the correspondence which has been read could be printed by to-morrow morning, and when the House next meets we should be in a position to discuss the whole question. I urge upon this House, in the best interests of the people of the country, in the interests of Ministers, and in the interests even of His Excellency himself, that it is its duty to consider this question carefully and well. We should make ourselves acquainted with all the precedents we can get, and then give a fair and unbiassed decision. I ask the House for once to cast aside all party feelings and ties, and to do its duty properly to the people it represents.

that we should be asking for time to consider this question and at the same time be prejudging it. It appears that we are castigating the Governor first and trying him afterwards. I do not understand, from the correspondence, that the Governor proposes to refer the question of the breach of privilege to the Secretary of State. All I understand His Excellency to say is that, as the House has brought him directly to account for an alleged breach of privilege, and as he has consequently been placed in a rather peculiar constitutional position, he wishes to get the opinion of the Secretary of State before he gives a definite reply to the message which he received from this House. That is an altogether different thing from remitting the question of breach of privilege to the Secretary of State. I think the Governor is right in holding the opinion that, if he refuses to act on the advice of his Ministers, and if they do not resign in consequence, they must accept his actions. I believe that a Ministry who allow the Governor to refuse to take their advice without tendering their resignations, place themselves even in the position of having to defend his actions. Otherwise we should have two parties to contend points with, because the most serious consequences might arise through the most trivial action of the Governor, when he had acted without taking the advice of his Ministers. Therefore we should, in such a case, have two parties responsible to us—the Ministry and the Governor. Ministers must defend the action of the Governor, but they have always the right to resign and refuse to advise the Governor any longer. If they resigned, the House would ask why they had done so; and they would reply that it was because the Governor had refused to take their advice. After they had resigned the Governor must yield the point originally in dispute, or get a Ministry which would justify his action. I shall not now enter into the question of breach of privilege, or of the position of Ministers with regard to the Governor. I think we should be better able to discuss the question to-morrow. I say this because we have been told that the Government do not wish to go on with Government business to-morrow, and it was for that reason that I voted for the adjournment over to-morrow. I understand that in all probability they will not be able to go on with their business until Monday next. Of course honorable gentlemen who are attacked have a perfect right to defend themselves, but I hope that the discussion will not be carried on further until we have the printed correspondence in our hands. We may then discuss the matter with calmness, and we shall then be better able to do justice to all parties.

Mr. REYNOLDS. — I think that even the honorable member for Wellington City will admit, if he looks calmly at the matter, that it would be better to take this question into consideration to-morrow, if it should be taken at all. There is no necessity for any delay. The papers can be printed to-night and placed in the hands of honorable members early to-morrow, so that they may have an opportunity of reading over the whole of the correspondence, and can come down to the House at half-past two o'clock prepared to consider the question. The matter should be taken into consideration at the earliest possible moment, out of courtesy to His Excellency the Governor. Then there is another reason. As I understood from the correspondence, His Excellency invited the House, or the Ministry, I am not sure which, to offer any remarks they pleased, so that they might be forwarded along with his own despatch to the Secretary of State. If the House is to deal with the matter at all, it is well that its opinion should be given to His Excellency at the earliest possible date. The San Francisco mail will be leaving in a few days, and, if the consideration of the question is delayed until Monday, it will be Tuesday before the Committee can sit, and perhaps Wednesday or even Thursday before the Committee's report can be brought up. I think that there has been a great deal too much made of the question. A great part of the session has been taken up with questions of privilege, disqualification, and votes of want of confidence. There has been a large amount of time wasted; and most of these questions that have been brought before the House have been brought forward too hastily—the time has been inopportune at which to discuss them, even if it were necessary to bring them forward at all. I was going to say that I feel astonished at the remarks of the honorable member for Wellington City; but I ought not to be astonished at any remarks made by him. I have had the honor of knowing the honorable gentleman for a considerable number of years, and I have always found that what he states to-day is very likely to be reversed to-morrow. It is to be regretted that the honorable member is not more stable than he is. I trust it is only a little ebullition of temper that he has given way to on the present occasion, and that to-morrow he will consider the matter calmly and coolly, and give every assistance—not as a party man, because it should not be a party question—to bring the House out of the scrape which I believe it is in.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I do not propose now to enter into a discussion of these important questions, because I think they require very careful consideration. It is quite true that there are two questions raised, but it is very difficult to see the bearing of each question at present, having only just heard the correspondence read; and, for my part, I altogether object to go into the matter too hastily. I desire that we should have the papers before us and have time to give proper consideration to them. After these papers are printed they will probably be placed in our hands as we come into the House to-morrow, and I ask whether or not we shall have sufficient time to give them that consideration which they appear to me to deserve. The honorable member for Auckland City East impressed upon us that these were very important questions, that they should receive the careful consideration of this House, and not a party consideration; but then he went on to hurry us, and proposed that we should proceed with the discussion to-morrow, before we have had sufficient time to consider the correspondence. I think that is rather inconsistent. If the matter is so important that we should consider these papers properly, and give careful consideration to them, I think he was wrong in pressing us to deal with it so hastily as to take it to-morrow. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the honorable member for Wellington City will be accepted. I have only one word to say to my honorable friend the member for Port Chalmers. He is the last man who should talk about changes of opinion. He sits there as the most notable example of a man who can change his opinion, and I think he is fairly entitled—adopting a word which has been used in this House as a proper mode of expression—to be called one of the principal apostates. I do not wish to discuss this matter at any length now, but I ask the House quietly and calmly to let the matter stand over until Monday afternoon, at half-past seven o'clock. We can get the papers printed to-morrow, and shall have them in our hands a sufficient time to enable us to consider them as they deserve.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman who has just sat down has called the honorable member for Port Chalmers the principal apostate. I rather liken him to a certain person who, going down to Jerusalem, fell among thieves. He was amongst them for several years, until the Government took him in hand and bound up his wounds. I will propose a solution of this difficulty which, perhaps, will have the consent of the House—namely, that we adjourn the House till half-past seven o'clock to-morrow evening, by which time all the papers will be in print. My honorable friend opposite shakes his head. It is our misfortune to have a hungry Opposition—a famishing Opposition. The Indian famine is not “a circumstance” to it. There ought to be a subscription started in the House for them. If something of that kind is not done they will be famishing by the political road-side. I shall make the proposal I have indicated presently; but in the meantime I desire to refer to what has taken place in the present debate. The honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) moved in this matter when it was first brought up; he proposed the appointment of the Committee, he went to that Committee, took part in its debates, and, when the report was brought up, said that, although he was not present when it was adopted by the Committee, yet he entirely concurred in it; and yet he stands up to-night and calls that report in question. The honorable gentleman's action reminds me of a certain momentous occasion about eighteen and a half centuries ago, when the greatest sacrifice the world ever saw was about to be finished. There was an Apostle called Peter, and he was very loud in his protestations of faith, and was angry when he was told that he would deny himself three times before the cock crew. The honorable member is Saint Peter. He will deny himself ten times before the cock crows to-morrow morning. Sir, the honorable gentleman is a will-o'-the-wisp. You never know when you have him. He is here, there, and everywhere—with us to-day, with the Opposition to-morrow; with himself one day, with the man in the street the next. If I were to repeat what one hears in the lobbies, I believe I should make the honorable gentleman do what he has not done for the last twenty years for political causes—I should make him blush. My honorable friend told us that there are people in this House who do not know what is due between gentlemen and gentlemen. Who are the gentlemen to whom he refers? I suppose all the virtue is on the Opposition side, and I presume that, now the honorable gentleman has made up his mind which way he will go, all the gentility is there also. I do not happen to be of that class which calls itself gentlemen:

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?

It is no assertion of the kind the honorable member referred to that makes a man a gentleman. It is his acting straightforwardly, sticking to his word, standing by his party, and abnegating self. We are told that in this matter we laid a palpable and patent trap for His Excellency the Governor. To that statement I give, as far as I can within the limits of the Standing Orders, the most emphatic denial. I say it is absolutely untrue. My honorable friend the member at the head of the Government has been charged time after time with being anxious to break up the Empire, and, above all things, to promote a conflict with the Governor. I say that he of all the members of the Cabinet is the least to blame and the least responsible for the advice given to the Governor as to the appointment of Mr. Wilson, and that the accusation made by the honorable member and by those who back him up in making it is cowardly, unjustifiable, and entirely apart from the facts.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I suggested that as the reason.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—My honorable friend belongs to the same profession as myself, only that he appears to differ from me in this respect, that when he comes to this House he forgets that he has not got a brief. If I were in Court, I would like to make the best for my client; but in this House I cease to be an advocate and become a judge, and on all questions of this kind forget party and do not allow party spirit to actuate me. The honorable gentleman spoke of the honest feelings Ministers ought to possess. Sir, ought there to be no honesty in the Opposition? Ought there to be no honesty in what I may term the last seven bones of its tail? Should not those seven joints wriggle with something like honesty about them? I think they ought. I think that Ministers and their party and the Opposition properly so called can afford to stand on one side and leave the honorable gentleman and his friends to defend themselves from the charge of want of honesty in doing their work in this House. We have heard much about apostacy. I say, at once and frankly, that if those honorable gentlemen had taken up their stand when we met as a party some few days ago to elect a chief in a room in this building, if they had left that party at once and for ever, I would have got up in my place and attempted to justify their doing so, because there had been, so far as they were concerned, a departure from the principles upon which that party was formed. But they did not do so. They did not, perhaps, remain in the room; but they came one by one to myself and others and repeated their pledges, and they said, "No matter what happens, we will support the party until the end of the session." My honorable friend the member for Totara, whose moderation I admire, said to me and to others, "Even if you put in six pairs of old shoes, I will vote for you to the end of the session." (No.) I will not quarrel about terms.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I never had any private conversation with the honorable member on the subject.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I am not speaking of a private conversation, but of what the honorable gentleman said to myself and others. So far as I remember, it was said at the very caucus.

Mr. GISBORNE.—No.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Well, the honorable gentleman gave his promise to certain people. The honorable member for Avon gave the same promise. (No.) I heard the honorable gentleman myself say so. The honorable member may have made a reservation the same as the honorable member for Totara and the others.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I absolutely dissociated myself from the whole proceeding.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—My honorable friend is speaking of that particular day. He was angry on that day, for certain things had not happened according to his expectations. On that evening he began to repent. On the following day he was in what I may call a state of grace, and distinctly promised that he would support the present Government to the end of the session, so long as they made no departure from certain fixed principles known to himself. I am reminded of what took place not very long ago in the Parliament of New South Wales. In that Parliament there were two well-defined parties, consisting altogether of about three-fourths, or perhaps four-fifths, of the House. But there was an undescribed, a nondescript party, consisting of some seven or eight members, who fought for their own ends. An honorable gentleman suggests the "seven devils." Seven devils under the circumstances would have behaved far better. What happened in New South Wales? No matter what party came into power, unless this nondescript party had a large share of what was going they went over to the other side at once, and there was another crisis. When that crisis was over and a new Ministry formed, if the nondescript party had not again a very large share, they went over again. The result was that the expression of opinion of a large majority of the House was nullified by a numerically contemptible and insignificant part of the House. The Governor was asked for a dissolution, and he agreed to dissolve, but gave as his reasons that, while there were two well-defined parties composed of the great bulk of the House, there was one section giving allegiance to neither party, and which, by giving its vote to one side or the other, was able to prevent all possible good Parliamentary government.

Mr. Sheehan

That is our position at the present time. There is a section of this House which shifts its political opinions and faith exactly as one might drink off a glass of wine, with as much pleasure and with as little thought. So long as that is the case it is impossible to have any good Parliamentary government. My honorable friend talks about drawing a red-herring across the scent. Well, if there be any man who knows how to get hold of a red-herring and to draw it across the scent I think he is that person. If any person has a specialty in that direction I give the palm to the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers). We have drawn no red-herring across the scent. He himself was the very first who raised the question after the honorable member for Dunedin City, and he pushed it to an extreme. He proposed it should be sent to a Committee, and helped to get the House adjourned. What did the honorable member mean by repudiating his own action? The honorable gentleman speaks about our position being a contemptible one.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I did not say so.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman spoke decidedly, and I think, Sir, was checked by you.

Mr. TRAVERS.—If I may be permitted, I would state that I did not refer to the Government. I said the position of this question in this House was contemptible.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman used the expression several times; and I appeal to the House.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I rise to a point of order. I believe it is a standing rule in this House that, when an honorable gentleman retracts what he has said, then nothing further is to be said about it. The honorable member for Wellington City did retract. He withdrew the word "contemptible" and substituted another word; and it is contrary to all Parliamentary practice to now refer to that remark.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Wellington City, on being remonstrated with, did formally withdraw the expression, and I do not think it should be subsequently commented upon.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I yield, of course, to your ruling. I do not think, Sir, you have had to call me to order many times since you have been in the chair. The honorable gentleman did use the expression. Now it is said he has withdrawn it. Of course he will withdraw anything, and this expression amongst the rest. But I will suppose he said so. I will suppose he applied the term "contemptible" to the Ministry. I will put it as a supposititious case, and I will ask the House to contrast our behaviour with his, and let members on both sides draw the moral for themselves. We understand correctly what is our position as responsible Ministers of this colony. We are not here for the purpose of supporting His Excellency the Governor. We are really to act as a Committee of this House during the recess, to advise His Excellency with respect to the governing of the colony. If I were to understand that I became a Minister to support the Governor against this House, I would throw the position to the winds in a moment. I say at once that, if His Excellency came into collision with this House upon a matter on which we advised him, and if he did so in consequence of following our advice, we should fight for him to the bitter end. If we advised him in a particular course which brought him into conflict with this House we should be unworthy of our position, or of the confidence of this House, if we did not fight for him shoulder to shoulder. But what is the present position? What is the present conflict? It arises out of the fact that the Governor disregarded the advice of his Ministers. He absolutely refused to proceed on our advice, and put us in such a position that we cannot take his part in this House. I put it to the House fairly: Ought we to be bound to defend His Excellency's conduct in this House except it appears that his conduct is in accordance with the advice of Ministers? I would put an extreme case: Let us suppose that His Excellency committed murder, high treason, or some other offence known to the law. Should we be bound to back him up in this House on that point? Certainly not. And when he leaves the strictly constitutional path—when he goes against the advice of his Ministers—he ought to look out for himself. Now, it has been distinctly and clearly settled by this House that, in rejecting the advice of his Ministers in regard to a particular matter on the grounds given in his memorandum, he departed from constitutional practice and committed a breach of privilege. That is clear; and I say at once, so far as I am concerned, I will refuse to go outside this House to a third and irresponsible party to settle for us what are our privileges. We settle that for ourselves. We know our privileges. They are strictly defined by the Standing Orders and May's "Parliamentary Practice;" and, beyond all doubt, whoever holds the position of Governor in this colony has no right to take notice of what takes place in the House before it is brought under his notice by message or other official intimation. We have been told that we ought to resign on our advice being refused. Sir, I smiled inwardly when I heard that suggestion. When I look back at the fight we had for three or four years to get a position on these seats for our party, I am not disposed to give up our position for a small thing of that kind. If we are to be turned out, let us be beaten on a large question of policy. I can assure honorable gentlemen on the other side that we shall not be entrapped. We have been accused of trying to entrap people, but we shall not be entrapped ourselves. When we resign our position it will be after a fair fight. What I would point out to the House is this: It has been clearly put that the Governor occupies an equal position with the Upper House and the Lower House, and that these three distinct bodies form the General Assembly of this colony. Now, it has been said that the Governor has been tried without being heard, and that even the commonest criminal is entitled to be heard up to the moment of the passing of his sentence. But, supposing that this House is in conflict with the Upper House, are they heard here? Certainly not. The honorable member for Egmont shakes his head after the fashion of Lord Burleigh—I know him too well to say there is nothing in it—but I say at once that the position of the Council is in no respect different.

Mr. GISBORNE.—They have conferences.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—So has the Governor. He has conferences with Ministers, and he has conferences with this House by means of messages. I think that plea is one that cannot be heard for a moment. He is an individual branch of the Legislature. He can take his own stand, and he can dismiss Ministers to-morrow if he thinks proper. Let him take that responsibility if he thinks it right to do so. Now, I put it to the House as a matter of fair-play. To-day we asked the House to postpone the Government business until next Monday. If I had not thought the honorable member for the Thames was to reply on the question, I would myself have pointed out the reasons for that motion. They were partly personal and partly general reasons. For the last seven or eight days I have been out of the running, and have been unable to work or do any business. If we are to do Government business I would be very glad to have one day to myself to discuss the Bills with the officers who prepared them. Furthermore, I may say at once we have had a very uneasy time since we have been in office. How it comes about I do not know. But honorable gentlemen, on leaving these benches, cast a "longing, lingering look behind," and are eagerly looking forward to the moment when they may get back. They have disturbed the course of public business; and clearly they have as much right to put us out as we had to put them out. At the same time, honorable gentlemen know perfectly well that, with a want-of-confidence motion hanging over the head of the Government, it is impossible to go on with the ordinary business of the country. For various reasons the honorable gentleman's party were unsuccessful with one motion, and it appears they considered it to be the duty of the Government party to send cabs round to the absent members of the Opposition inviting them to be present at the House at half-past two sharp in order to take part in the discussion. I take it that he should look after his own men as we take care of ours. However, seeing that the gentlemen absent were the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) and the honorable member for Totara, I think a reasonable doubt might be entertained as to how they would have voted had they been here. I would not like to bet an even pound as to how they would vote. I say that the position now is entirely different. We fought a fair fight—first, in putting them out; and, secondly, in keeping ourselves in. But if we are to have chronic votes of want of confidence we must put our foot on these things. We do not come here for the enjoyment of the citizens of Wellington; we have more serious work. The honorable member for Egmont no doubt feels pouri, as the Maoris say, when he walks the streets as a private citizen, and finds himself no longer saluted and "kotowed" as he used to be when a Minister. But, in spite of my personal friendship for him, I must prefer the interests of the country to him, and if he proposes a dozen votes of want of confidence we intend to let them come in the ordinary course. Formerly the whole burden of the honorable gentleman's speeches used to be that the Opposition were talking against time and obstructing business. Well, what is the position of the Opposition at the present time? Are they obstructing business, talking against time, and acting like a factious Opposition? Not by any means. They have a strong opinion that the honorable member for Egmont is the only salvation the country possesses, and that those people who happen to cling around him are the only people capable with him of governing the country. We are a protest against that idea. We are a protest against the idea that the power to govern the country is centered in the hands of a few people in this House. And it is on that footing that we are supported, as we are now, by three-fourths of the population of the colony. And I say this much: that if the honorable gentleman and his party were to go to the country to-morrow they would remain in the country. They would not come back here again. They can take their turn if they think proper. Let them join with us to-night and ask the Governor to give us a dissolution. I think I might say, without being offensive to my honorable friend the member for Egmont, that he would, in such a case, be left to look after his private affairs. I say, again, that, if the Opposition mean business, if they mean really to have a fair fight, then, at this stage of the session, they ought not to obstruct the public business of the country. We are prepared to go on with the business on Monday, to take up every Bill on the Paper and deal with it as we may be advised. And, furthermore, it is only perfectly fair that the House should vote for the adjournment asked for until Monday to enable us to go on with the business. It is not our fault that we are not able to go on to-morrow; the conduct of the honorable gentleman opposite prevented us from doing so. I put it on a benevolent and charitable footing. I think my honorable friend is entitled to some rest. He has been flitting about like the Wandering Jew. He has had no ease or nourishment. He has had no peace of mind for a moment. He is to be found in the House and within its precincts at all possible times. No matter what may be the wear and tear of the members of the Government, some regard ought to be shown to the devoted leader of the Opposition. I am glad that my honorable friend has been officially announced to be leader of the Opposition, for if I had not known it from himself and his party I should have looked upon him as the principal Opposition whip. I may say at once that I would not lend myself to any proceeding that would cast a reflection on the Governor. I look upon it, to my mind, in this free country, living under our free institutions, that any such course as that would be one of the greatest crimes and blunders which the Parliament could commit. There may be reforms in the law proposed and carried out; there may be changes in the representation and mode of taxation; but, on the whole, I maintain that there cannot be a freer country in the world than is this colony. I look upon the bond that binds us to the mother-country in the person of the Governor as one of the best features in our Constitution. I would never be one to consent to part with that connecting link, nor would I be a party to throw upon him any contempt or obloquy whatever. I say at once, for myself and my colleagues, that in no sense whatever have we attempted in any way to throw the slightest censure or cast the slightest indignity upon His Excellency the Governor. The advice given by us was given in the most perfect good faith, coming in, as we did, with the majority of this House, and having no reason to believe that we should be in a minority. For my own part I feel exceedingly sorry that the reply made by the Governor was such as to my mind to lay him open to the censure this House has put upon him. We wish to raise no quarrel with him. We had no desire to raise a question that might lead to a quarrel between this House and the executive head of the colony. That being the case, I think I may fairly ask the House to consent to the proposal made—namely, to adjourn the debate on this question until such time as the papers are printed. They are very voluminous, and it is impossible that the House can consider the question properly until honorable members have had the printed papers before them. I promise you, Sir, and the House, that every effort shall be made to get these papers printed as early as possible to-morrow, so that before half-past seven o'clock honorable members may have some hours to study the papers. This will save time, and it will enable us to spend the day in arranging the Government business to come before the House during next week. We shall thus be able to kill two birds with one stone. I would ask the honorable member to reflect on Mount Egmont, the central feature of his district and one of the loveliest and highest mountains in New Zealand. I would ask him to take a high view of this question—to raise himself above the limit of perpetual snow, if possible—to sink all party considerations, and allow us the reasonable time we are entitled to for considering those large public questions now before the House. I will refer to one question which, in his mind, is most important—the Land Bill. In respect to that Bill, I may say that there is no one more desirous than I am to have that Bill carried through and made law, if possible, this session. I would ask him to give me fair, reasonable time to consider that Bill, so that, with his assistance and the assistance of his late colleagues, we may be able to pass this measure. If I remember aright, when the honorable member brought forward his no-confidence motion he gave it as almost the only reason why we should not remain in office that we were disposed to object to and shelve, if possible, a liberal Land Bill. Now, if he will give us anything like reasonable time we will show that his objection upon that score is entirely undeserved and unmerited. I put it to him, if he is as strong as a giant, not to use his strength as some giants are disposed to do. Let him deal with us gently and fairly. If he wants concessions from the Government in respect to his own matters let him and his party show us some consideration, so that the Ministry and the House, notwithstanding any party conflict that may be raging, may endeavour as far as possible to carry on the business of the country. If he will meet us in a friendly spirit, we, possibly, will meet him in a similar spirit; but, if he is disposed to do as he has tried to do to-day, to prevent business being done, then that means that there will be "war to the knife." We know what our present party is. They were in opposition for some three or four years. If it comes to a question of "war to the knife"—if we have to fight step by step, inch by inch—there are in our ranks honorable members who before this have led us to victory, and who will lead us to victory again. I would ask whether, at this stage of the session, we might not possibly sink purely personal recriminations, purely selfish motives, and take up matters from a broader, a more patriotic and popular basis. If my honorable friend approves of these sentiments, and they are agreeable to him, he will meet me fairly by consenting to an adjournment of the debate until half-past seven o'clock to-morrow.

Major ATKINSON.—What about Motion No. 3?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Well, No. 3 must be discussed on its merits. It happens just now to be in a bog. My honorable friend will have, in the course of the next few days, to put an advertisement in the evening paper asking where No. 3 has gone to. So far as I can see at present, No. 3 will in a few days become No. 80. If he is generous, if he is considerate, looking at the immense power he has at present, if he is merciful, it is possible that those who have control over No. 3, which is in the position of a neglected and criminal child at present—it is possible that those persons may be disposed to deal with that infant tenderly, not to subject it to what is known as baby-farming, but to give it a fair chance of existence. I am sorry for taking up the time of the House so long. I rose to protest against the severe philippic of the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), which is clearly undeserved, unfounded, and, I may say, entirely in contradiction with himself. I rose to defend myself and my colleagues against the charge of being a party to attacking His Excellency. Such a charge is entirely without foundation; it is absolutely contrary to our ideas and wishes; it is a course to which I, for one, would never consent to be a party. I rose to defend ourselves from the charge that we occupy in this matter a worse position than the Governor. I take it for granted that we are the trustees and custodians of the honor of this House, and, no matter how it may affect the Governor's position, we were bound to protect the privileges of the House. So soon as we considered that the Governor had infringed those privileges we put the matter before the House at the earliest possible moment. Having defended ourselves against the unfounded charges made against us, I shall not further take up the time of the House. I do trust that the honorable gentlemen on the opposite side will see their way to support the proposal I have made. To-morrow being a public holiday there will not be a single person at work. Every public office and institution in the town will be taking a holiday. I go further and say that in no part of the British dominions will there be a single legislative body sitting to-morrow; so strong is their patriotic and loyal feeling that every one of them will keep that day loyally on account of its being the birthday of the Queen's son, the person who will afterwards, in the ordinary course of events, be the Ruler of our Empire. My honorable friend, when he remembers that we are charged with being a party of radicals, people who are going to burst up large estates, and who meditate breaking off connection with the mother-country and establishing a republic, ought to set us a good example. He ought to show us the way in which we should go. It would have been better for him to-day to have got up and proposed the adjournment rather than my honorable friend the Premier, who is said to hold such radical opinions. Such a motion came from him with a very bad grace. If the honorable gentleman had even seconded the motion, as he ought to have done, he would then have been in his proper place. I may say, finally, for myself that I cannot help recollecting the time when the honorable gentleman figured in Taranaki with his banner waving at the head of his troops under the lofty shadow of Mount Egmont. The honorable gentleman seems to have forgotten those times. He has sunk the military in the political character. He has forgotten that he holds Her Majesty's commission. At the same time I think it is a pity that he should not have set a good example to the rest of the colony and to the rest of the Empire by supporting the motion brought forward by my honorable friend; it is a pity that he should, for the sake of a fight for office, from an unseemly greed for office, from a desire to occupy again the position of a Minister, have taken the course he has adopted of opposing the motion. I think the honorable gentleman, from the position he has held, ought to be above such things as that. I trust that we shall discuss this question entirely apart from any party considerations, and merely with a view of ascertaining what is the position of this House in regard to His Excellency the Governor. And, even if it should turn out that a majority of this House think that Ministers are to blame rather than the Governor, I must say that this is a question which should not be discussed from a party point of view, and I will be prepared to accept and abide by the sentence of the House.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, in regard to the special question now under consideration—namely, whether we should consider this message from His Excellency and the correspondence between His Excellency and Ministers to-morrow or on Monday—I think that abundant reason has been shown why it would be very unsatisfactory to consider them to-morrow. If they are so important as some honorable members seem to think, we could not possibly consider them properly between the time at which they are printed and the hour of sitting at half-past two tomorrow. I therefore think it would be wise to postpone the consideration of them until half-past two on Monday. The speech which the honorable gentleman has delivered, and especially that part in which he made direct reference to myself, has thrown considerable light on the present position, and allows me to see my way to adjourn to-morrow, and to get over all the difficulties that may be in our road. It is agreed on both sides that neither of us wishes to waste any more time. The honorable gentleman, like myself and others on this side of the House, is desirous of meeting and facing the difficulties at once.

Mr. STOUT.—What difficulty?

Major ATKINSON.—Any difficulty that may be in the way of carrying on public business. The honorable gentleman is desirous of facing and getting over any such difficulty. I will submit a proposition which will remove all difficulties. If the honorable gentleman is prepared to take a division upon the want-of-confidence motion to-night—(Oh, oh!)—I am putting him to the practical proof. I am prepared to go to a division upon that motion within ten minutes. Then we can adjourn till Monday, and, if the honorable gentleman is victorious, he can in the meantime consider his measures, and will, I can assure him, have a most generous support from this side of the House in carrying them through. What we want to test is simply this: Whether the honorable gentlemen who occupy those benches are supported by a majority of the House or not. We say that they are not, and that by their action they know it quite well. I say again, let him take the division, and we can go on with the other business on the Paper and get it all over by half-past ten. Then, if he has the allegiance of a majority of this House, he will know it indisputably, and he will not only have to-morrow and Saturday to prepare his measures, but he will have the assistance of the Opposition in carrying them through. That I can guarantee him. (Laughter.) Honorable gentlemen may laugh, but they know perfectly well that if I give my word for a thing it will be carried out. If he does not believe me, and once asserts his position, he can at any rate defy me; but, until the other side have done that, they will not be permitted to proceed with any business whatever. If we have to sit here continuously for a week they shall not proceed with any business until that motion of mine is disposed of. I call upon him to settle this definitely at once. Let us see who has the majority, and let the majority rule. The majority will no longer submit to be governed by the minority. I challenge the honorable gentleman, if he is sincere, to come to a conclusion at once. Let us get through the business, and then everything he has told us to-night will come to pass.

Sir G. GREY.—I trust that the House will indulge me by allowing me to reply to the remarks of the honorable gentleman. Sir, there is such a thing as a majority in this House—a majority, it may be, of one or two, obtained we know not how; and there is such a thing as a majority of this country. That is the great court of appeal, and the honorable gentlemen dare not face it. Let the House remember that two years ago the party that now sits on this side of the House consisted of only some fifteen members. Gradually it has grown in strength, gradually it has grown in power from year to year, and gradually it has won the affections of the country. We have gradually convinced the people of New Zealand that there are those who will free them from the enormous debts that have been entailed upon them; that there are those who feel that the crime which the honorable member for Egmont has been guilty of in spending, or helping to spend, some twenty-seven millions in five years, upon the small population of this country, is a thing that demands the indignation of the people: demands that other men should be put in power to see how such a vast expenditure has been brought about, to see why its results are so small, where it has gone, and upon whom this great debt is fairly ultimately to be placed. Why, the taxation is so unfair that the poor are made to contribute towards enhancing the value of the property of the rich, while their own interests are utterly disregarded, and they have been robbed of the privileges conferred upon them by the British Parliament. The venerable jester from Wanganui (Mr. Fox) got up a few nights ago and informed us that he and his party had given free institutions to every part of New Zealand; whilst he knows in his heart, and they know in their hearts, that they with care have taken every precaution that the inhabitants of the counties should be in part deprived of power altogether, and the rest of them put in such a position that the vast majority of them should have one vote, while to those who have acquired property, even unfairly, as many as forty-five votes should be given to one single individual. These are the free institutions those honorable gentlemen on the opposite side have established! These are the chains they have bound about the people of this country, from which the people cannot be freed for years to come! These are the means by which they are attempting to pay the enormous debts which have been incurred for the benefit of those who have not to pay them! They would pretend now to be ready to establish a fair system of taxation. Why have they not done it during the many years they have been in power? Why do they only say they will do it when they see great indignation, nay, hatred, in almost every face they meet as they walk about? Why have they, in attempting to establish local self-government, established an unfair system of voting? Why have they created rotten boroughs like those of Taranaki, with their three members, whilst the larger constituencies are deprived of anything like proper representation? Why have they dealt unfairly with the land? Why have they given great properties unjustly to their friends? Why has the land been kept from the people? The member for Wanganui to whom I have alluded told us that shoemakers, and carpenters, and blacksmiths, and others of that class did not desire land—that they did not care about getting land or having a liberal land law. I ask him, are there not very many of those persons who wish to see their children on farms? Do they not themselves desire to have farms on which to settle in their old age? Why should such trash be talked in this House? Then, the honorable member for Egmont challenges us—he is very fond of that word “challenge”—and says, “Let my motion of no confidence come on.” The honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), and one or two more of his friends, are at this moment in a certain frame of mind, and he says, “Come to a vote in half an hour, and we are safe.” Sir, I tell those honorable gentlemen that myself and those who are acting with me feel that a sacred trust has been confided to our hands. We know and feel that the people of this country believe now that hope is dawning for them; that they are prepared to return to this House a vast majority to carry out the views which I and my friends hold: and we say that by no laches, by no mistake on our part, will we be turned from the position which we now occupy. Every form that Parliamentary government affords us to defend our position, we will avail ourselves of. They may try to stop public business; they may try further to injure the people of this country than they have already done; they may try, having bribed in every direction in which they can—

Major ATKINSON.—I beg to call attention to the words the honorable member has used. I move that they be taken down: “bribed in every direction in which they can.” I shall call upon the honorable member to prove those words.

Sir G. GREY.—I presume that the sentence is to be completed.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Rising to the point of order, I think the honorable member should be allowed to complete the sentence, so that the House may know in what sense it is made. I remember that on one occasion I said with regard to one section of the House—the rural party, as the honorable member for Wairarapa will remember—that it had been bought and sold, and was being bought again. But I merely meant that they had had promises made to them that their policy would be carried out, that those promises were broken, and that they were being made again. I daresay, when the honorable member finishes his sentence, it will be found that there is nothing objectionable in the words, although in the meantime, taken per se, I must say they are rather strong.

Sir G. GREY.—When I was interrupted, Sir, I was going on to say, “by promising subsidies to counties, to boroughs, and to Road Boards.”

Major ATKINSON.—I have no desire to proceed further with the motion for taking down the words. I am satisfied with the explanation of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the House acts wisely in allowing the matter to drop.

Sir G. GREY.—I was addressing the House upon the subject of the proposition made by the honorable member for Egmont, and I was stating the reasons why I felt it my duty not to abandon, if possible, the position in which I have been placed. I had pointed out that, throughout the series of years during which the late Government held office, a Government to which the honorable member for Egmont was attached for three years, their every step, in my belief, had tended to encumber the country with debt and wasteful expenditure; that no fair provision was made for dealing with the public lands; that an unfair system of taxation was upheld; that the people were being gradually deprived of the rights which free men ought to possess; and that they were led into the belief that a fair system of local self-government was being given to them, while, in reality, a system of an opposite character was being set up. I pointed out that this had been done by holding out bribes to local bodies in the form of subsidies, which I believe the Government in their own minds knew could only be continued for a very short time. I have said, and I hold the belief strongly, that, occupying the position I now occupy, I owe a solemn duty to this country. I believe that, with the aid of the able men who have given me most loyal and friendly assistance, great reforms can be brought about in New Zealand—that a total change in what I regard as the established system can be worked out. I feel confident in my own mind that, unless a speedy remedy in that direction is applied, chains will be bound round the people of this country from which they will hardly be able to free themselves—chains of debt, chains of subservience to the richer ranks: because, once men are deprived of that fair power of voting in the country by which alone they can make their wishes known; once they are robbed of those privileges by which alone they can make manifest the power they should wield in moulding the destinies of the country; once they are deprived of those advantages, it becomes a desperate struggle, a struggle which may extend over a long series of years, to regain them. Under these circumstances, I could not enter into such a compromise as that proposed by the honorable member for Egmont. I said, and I meant it, that we would use every legitimate and lawful means to maintain the position we now hold, until the people are appealed to—until they, the masters of the late Government as well as of the present Government, have resolved what shall be the future of this their adopted land. In part consideration of the question that has come before us to-night, there are one or two material points to which I wish to allude. The people of New Zealand little think of what they have been deprived. Hardly a member of this House has (certainly not half a dozen members have) ever considered the nature of the changes the Constitution of this country has undergone. Let us reflect for one moment what was the position of the people of New Zealand two years ago, or rather twelve months ago, for the act was only then accomplished. At that time, New Zealand was divided into several provinces which possessed almost sovereign powers. To men like yourself, Sir, who are acquainted with constitutional law, it will be known that, in regard to those provinces, Her Majesty had been pleased to renounce almost every right of sovereignty which could interfere with their liberties. They elected, in fact, their Governors, called Superintendents; they elected Legislatures, which had,

with a few exceptions, in each province the power of making all laws for the peace, order, and good government of the numerous inhabitants of those provinces. Some of those provinces exceed the majority of British colonies in wealth and population; and Her Majesty had renounced the power of assenting to or dissenting from the laws made by the Legislatures of those provinces. They might dispose of all fines, forfeitures, and penalties as they pleased under their own laws. They enjoyed perfect freedom, for Her Majesty had renounced all the powers I have referred to by the solemn Statute to which she gave her assent. When those provinces were done away with, there can be no doubt that those powers did not return to the Crown, and they can only be given to somebody else by law. Then we come to this General Assembly. Ample liberties were also given to it. All power of interference on the part of the Crown with the General Assembly was renounced, with the exception of the power of assenting to or dissenting from the laws in a few cases; and it was believed that, under these circumstances, no dispute would arise between the mother-country and this colony. But, Sir, all that has been broken through. I will now refer to the special subject which has been discussed to-night. The honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) applied language to me which I am sure he will regret. He accused my colleagues and myself of having laid a trap for the Governor, and he accused us also of other unworthy proceedings. I felt ashamed to be compelled to sit here and listen to such expressions being used. I will use no such expressions towards the honorable gentleman; but I will say that he had no just cause—he could not entertain even a suspicion which warranted his applying to us such language as he did. I wish to say—and it is known to my colleagues, some of whom are now sitting around me—that I did my very utmost to prevent any request being made to the Governor for the appointment of a gentleman to the Legislative Council. I opposed the taking of that step when I first went into office, and it was only at last that I yielded to repeated requests of my colleagues. I now come to the constitutional question, which I think has been altogether misunderstood; and I shall speak openly, because all the papers on the subject are before the House, and I shall be guilty of no breach of confidence. When I advised the Governor that a certain gentleman should be called to the Legislative Council, and when the Governor refused to accede to my request, on grounds which I believed to be unconstitutional, I gave way in the first moment to feelings which perhaps ought not to have come into my mind, and I wished to retire from office. It was only on the solicitations of my friends, and on being reminded of the field of usefulness which was open to me, that I determined to remain in the position I still hold. It may be said that, according to constitutional law, if I tendered advice to the Crown or the Crown's representative, and my advice was not taken, it was my duty to resign and hold my tongue. But I say that that depends altogether on the nature of the difference between myself and the representative of the Crown. If I find that the Governor is embarking on a course which I think imperils the liberties of the people, and is contrary to constitutional law, it is not my duty simply to resign and hold my tongue, because in that case step after step might be taken, without the knowledge of the people, until it would be impossible for us to retrace our steps and go back to the position from which we had departed. I felt it my duty to take the action I did—namely, to contest calmly, mildly, and in a friendly spirit the propriety of the course which was being taken. I dismissed at once from my mind the idea that His Excellency the Governor desired, by a side-wind, to force me to resign the position I hold. I knew him to be incapable of so unworthy an act. I knew in my own mind that he believed he was pursuing a course which he was rightly entitled to pursue. Of course, he had the same right to hold his opinion that I had to hold mine. If, however, I thought he was acting wrongly, I had a right to ask that the question should be determined and set at rest for ever. That was the course I felt it my duty to pursue. I thought it my duty further to say this: that we, the Parliament of New Zealand, were capable of dealing with this question ourselves; and that, therefore, we would allow no external power to be brought in to settle it, unless with our own consent. I thought it was better for the country at large that these internal questions should be settled by ourselves, without the aid of any Secretary of State or other person being invoked. I thought it was better to do that, in order to show to those statesmen who followed us that we were men capable of dealing with matters of this kind ourselves, and that there was no necessity for our bowing down before any officials in London. I maintained, and I still maintain—and I ask this Assembly to bear me out in it—that it is our duty ourselves to settle the question which has arisen. If we go to work properly, there need be no quarrel between us and the Governor. It is only such language as was used to-night by the honorable member for Wellington City, who was encouraged by the cries of honorable gentlemen on his side of the House to proceed, that can lead to such a quarrel. The Governor himself cannot desire that a quarrel should take place. His Excellency has occupied a seat in the English Parliament, and I am sure he cannot desire anything but the settlement of this constitutional question in this colony. The question has been brought up quite accidentally. I am persuaded that nothing could be better for us, or for the Imperial country, than that the question should be settled here, where it arose. Why should it not be so? The Colonial Office need not know that any such dispute has ever arisen. If I had liked, there was nothing to prevent me from sending Home the correspondence to the Secretary of State; but I was desirous that we should keep the facts to ourselves, for it is our bounden duty to settle the question amongst ourselves. I shall only trouble the House with one remark further. It is this: I think I acted rightly in retaining the position I hold, notwithstanding the differences of opinion which arose between the Governor and myself and my colleagues. Statesmen may take different views on questions of this kind, and yet remain the fastest and firmest friends. There may be persons who would not deal in a manly spirit with His Excellency, and who would leave him to confirm an erroneous step he had taken. I feel certain that no men could advise him more faithfully, according to their knowledge and ability, than we desire to do; and, as far as we can, we will do our utmost to get this question settled in an amicable and proper spirit. By promoting a union of this kind with the representative of the Crown, we shall have a better chance of achieving that which will be beneficial for the Colony of New Zealand than we should have by pursuing any other course. I think that those gentlemen who say that we have laid a trap for the Governor, and that we have led him into difficulties, are endeavouring to create differences between the Governor and his Advisers; and that such persons are indeed enemies of their country. I trust that the adjournment proposed by my colleague the Minister of Justice will be agreed to by the House. We are entirely in the hands of the House, but I think the request is so reasonable that the House should at once accede to it.

Mr. REID.—I have listened with great interest to the speech of the honorable gentleman. He has approached the subject in a tone and manner properly befitting the question we have been discussing. The honorable member has expressed his opinion that we are quite capable of dealing with this matter, and that by so doing we shall show to coming statesmen that we are competent to carry on our own affairs without reference to the Home Government. With regard to the correspondence which has been read to-night I cannot conceive anything more feeble than the arguments contained in the memoranda written by the Government to the Governor; and if that is a specimen of the ability we are to display to future legislators in these matters—if that is the best we can leave them—it is a very poor one indeed, and a very weak example. But what I desire to refer to are the remarks made before the adjournment in reference to the late Government, and in reference to what this Government are to do for the people of New Zealand. The honorable gentleman spoke beyond and over this House, and as informing the people what was to be accomplished for them by the new Government. The honorable member said that the first action on the part of this Government will be to free the people from their debts. Sir, I ask what example, what proof, what indication have we that this Government are to do anything to free the people of New Zealand from their debt?

Hon. MEMBERS.—Wait.

Mr. REID.—I understood you, Sir, to rule against interruptions, and I must claim your protection from these interruptions of honorable members. It has become, I was going to say, a standing disgrace, but I will say it has become a regular habit on the part of honorable members, when a member on this side of the House rises to speak, to make continual interruptions of a very unbecoming character. (No, no.) The honorable member for Dunedin is now giving an example of it, Sir.

Mr. STOUT.—I rise to a point of order. I apprehend you have already ruled, Sir.

Mr. REID.—I claim your protection, Sir. Am I out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member has risen to a point of order. I do not know yet what that point is.

Mr. STOUT.—The point is this: Whether the honorable member has a right to characterize my saying "No" as an interruption.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Not to an expression of that sort, unless it is uttered in a jeering spirit, when I think it is very undesirable; but, otherwise, it is quite in order. At the same time, although I did not hear any remarks said aside when the honorable member for the Taieri objected to interruptions, if any such were made, and whenever they are made, I say emphatically that they are exceedingly wrong and unparliamentary, and I shall always, when called upon, from whatever side of the House they proceed, do my best to put a stop to them.

Mr. REID.—There is an order of this House that no member shall interrupt another during debate, and I say that these "No, noes" are interruptions during debate; and I say, further, that this constant practice of rising to order when there is no point of order is a great source of disorder in this House, and one which I hope will be discontinued. For myself, I do not offend in that direction, and I object to being interrupted in my remarks by members rising to order when there is no point of order. I was asking, in what respect have we any indication that there is to be a diminution of the burdens of the people of New Zealand brought about by the present Government? What is the first measure we have been informed they intend to introduce? Why, instead of a Loan Bill of two millions we are to have a Loan Bill of five millions introduced by the present Government. Is that an indication of a desire to relieve the people of New Zealand from the debts which are being heaped upon them? Then, Sir, with regard to works which have been carried out, has not the late Government been charged with not going far enough in the way of incurring expenditure; and have we not had an example during the last few days of the reckless way in which the present Government allow the revenues of the colony to be voted at the dictation of any private member who rises in his place here; and have they not agreed to burdens being placed on the revenues of the country, and risen in their places and given their assent and support to such burdens being imposed, at the same time admitting that they have not looked into the papers on which those claims for expenditure are based? We had an instance of that not later than yesterday. Yet in the face of that the Premier rises and tells us that previous burdens have been recklessly laid on the country, and that this Government will relieve the people from them. This is a very poor indication. It is, to my mind, a very serious prospect as to future burdens if matters are to be carried on in the manner they have been since those gentlemen came on the Ministerial benches.

Sir G. GREY.—I might be allowed to rise to a personal explanation. There is no intention to ask for a loan of five millions. That sum is necessary to pay the debts of the country, but we do not propose to raise it if we can make other arrangements for a year.

Mr. REID.—I dispute the statement that that sum is necessary to pay the debts of the country; because I say that the statement of liabilities brought down by the Colonial Treasurer foretells the debts of the country, and is a statement that would cover the expenditure that has to be voted, and which sums, though not voted or expended, we are told comprised debts that were now due. But, if it requires five millions to pay the debts of the country, why does not the honorable gentleman bring down a Loan Bill for five millions for the purpose? Does he mean to say he is going to bring down a Loan Bill and at the same time to leave the existing debts unpaid? The honorable member is really very inconsistent when he promises to put the finances of the country in a satisfactory condition, and at the same time to carry out the enormous public works that the people have been led to believe, through the information conveyed by the telegraph wire to all parts of the country, the present Government is going to carry out. Sir, the policy which it talks of going to the country on is that of holding out delusive hopes to the people that public works will be carried out in a much more energetic and expeditious manner than they have been hitherto. What does that mean? It means an increased expenditure of public money, and not a relief of the debts of the people. The honorable member must think the people of this country are very blind and foolish if he supposes that they imagine that the mere fact of his presence there will carry out public works at a greater rate, and at the same time relieve the people from their burdens. If he thinks that the people are so misguided as that, he will find that he is mistaken, and that they are as intelligent as the great bulk of the members of this House, and as competent as the great majority of the members of this House have shown themselves to estimate the probability of this Government carrying out such a programme as they have indicated—namely, that of incurring a larger expenditure on public works, and at the same time relieving the people of their burdens. Then the honorable member complains that the revenues have been squandered—that there have been large loans. Sir, if the revenue has been spent, if twenty-four million or twenty-five million pounds have been squandered, has it been by the late Government? Has it been by the General Assembly of New Zealand? Does that sum not cover the whole of the expenditure that took place under the Provincial Governments? How much of that money was spent under the care of those institutions? I do not say that any of it has been squandered. I think it is quite possible that at the initiation of the Public Works scheme there was a reckless waste of the public revenue; but to tell us that that is a thing which any particular Government to-day is responsible for, or that even the Government that immediately preceded us on those benches is responsible for it, is to attempt to lead the House on a false scent altogether. Even assuming any such fault did exist, this House condoned it. I have always thought a great blunder was committed when, at the first initiation of the Public Works scheme, the Messrs. Brogden got very large contracts without those contracts having been submitted to public competition; and that the country paid too highly for those works. This House, however, was a consenting party; these things were carried by resolutions in this House; and therefore it was not the action of the Government, but the action of the Assembly itself. Then we are told that the people have been robbed of their liberties by the late Government. The only illustration of that which has been given came from the honorable gentleman's disciple the honorable member for Rangitikei, and was to the effect that under the Counties Act forty-five votes may be exercised within a county by one man, assuming that the county is divided into nine ridings, and that the voter has the maximum of property in each riding, which does not always follow. The honorable member's objection is to the scale of voting: he offers no objection to any person holding property in each riding, no matter how small the value, having nine votes. Now, if the honorable member has such an objection to this system of plurality of votes, how does it happen that in the province over which he presided for some time under the Road Ordinance the same system existed to a greater extent than it does under the Counties Act, the maximum number of votes being six or seven? The honorable member presided over the Province of Auckland for two years, I think; and why did he not take steps to alter that system, if it is so vicious? Why is it that we have not heard of any steps being taken here to repeal that obnoxious law? And it must be borne in mind that in that province it would take at least three or four of the road districts to make an area sufficient to cover a riding of any of the counties; and therefore, following out the same system of voting there, I contend that within a riding under the Road Board system as there carried out one person might have not forty-five votes, but probably ninety votes. If that is the only instance that can be given to us of how the people have lost their liberties—and that Act was only passed last year—I think the people will survive it. I believe that if the honorable gentleman puts this question to the people of New Zealand he will find that they recognize the justice of allowing those who have to bear the greater burden of rates to have the greater voice in the election of the representatives at these County Councils. The least said about the loss of the people's liberties in this respect the better. Following out the theory of the honorable gentleman, this is what we should have: We should have those who do not pay the rates imposing burdens upon those who do, and deciding what works should be carried out with the means they did not provide. That is a system which, I venture to think, will not commend itself to the good sense of the electorate of this colony nor to the members of this House. If the honorable gentleman believes that the people have lost their liberties in this respect, let him bring down a clause to amend the Counties Act in regard to the plurality of voting, and let him thus give proof of his desire to rescue the people and regain for them their liberties, and not stand up here and harangue in empty declamation about the liberties of the people, while he does not move his little finger on their behalf. The honorable member has told us that the taxation has not been taken off. What action is he taking now to take off taxation from the people of the colony? When sitting on these benches he said that he could retire into a back room and in one short half-hour bring forward a scheme whereby the taxation of the country would be altogether revised, its incidence altered, the working-men be relieved from oppression, every one treated fairly, and the rich men be taxed in proportion to their wealth, and in such a way as to break up the large estates. The honorable member wished to have a system of taxation that was to break up the large estates—that was to make each pay in proportion to his means, to pay progressively according to his estate. If that were so, and if the people of the colony were suffering as he told us, why has he not brought forward this proposal? He has now been nearly four weeks in office; and surely, if half an hour was enough for his predecessors to prepare a scheme to do justice, why does he not now bring in a measure to do justice?

Sir G. GREY. — If a dissolution is granted, and the people return members who will support it, I will bring down such a scheme at once.

Mr. REID. — The honorable gentleman required his predecessors to do it without a dissolution. The honorable member has not even sketched forth a scheme whereby it can be done. Before a dissolution he ought to show us how it can be done. He told us of great schemes in his mind. I have heard such schemes year after year, but I have looked for their realization in vain. I regard all this as barren talk, promising everything for everybody at the expense of nobody. The honorable gentleman says no fair provision has been made in past years for dealing with the public lands. What provision did he assist to make during last year when the question of dealing with the public lands was before us? Did he then assist to carry a measure dealing with the lands in a very liberal manner, or did he join a faction to prevent the Bill passing through? Did he not, instead of assisting to pass it, support a proposition that it should be read a second time that day six months? If he was so zealous in dealing with the public lands, why has he not, being in a position where he has the power to do so, pushed on the Bill now in our hands, which might be passed in twenty-four hours and sent to the Upper House, so that it might have a chance of becoming law during the present session? The reasons given for the postponement of that Bill were most lame and impotent, and confirmed me in the belief that honorable members were not so anxious as regards making a liberal provision for dealing with the lands as for the retention of their seats. The reason given by the Minister of Justice for not proceeding with the Land Bill was that certain of the Waste Lands Boards had sent in suggestions, which he had not had time to consider. Those suggestions were in the office before I left office, and were considered by myself, and some of them adopted by the Waste Lands Committee. Most of them had been introduced into the Bill. It certainly would not take the Native Minister more than an hour or two to go through the whole of those suggestions and make whatever alterations were required. It was simply a pretext for putting back the Bill and keeping it hung up in order to carry out the indication given by the honorable gentleman of a threat against the Canterbury members. He said he would consider their case in a fair spirit—that he could not say what would be done, but that he would do what was right to the country and fair to the people of Canterbury. I might contrast the action taken by the honorable member—if he is so sincere in the matter—with the action taken in 1872. In 1872 I had the fortune or misfortune to be in office for about the same period of time as the honorable gentleman has been. Did I drop the Land Bill under my charge? I took advantage of being in the Government in order to press it forward and pass it through; and if the honorable member were as sincere as I was he would take that course in regard to this Bill. I must say it is the greatest source of regret to me that the late Government did not remain in office one or two days longer, in order that I might have passed the Land Bill through the House, so that it could have been sent forward to the other Chamber. The Native Minister assured us that all the Bills would be carried through next week. I fear there is very little prospect of the Land Bill being carried through this session. We cannot expect that Bill, which has been before us for three months, to pass through the other branch of the Legislature in a few days. When the honorable gentleman told us that Parliament might be prorogued at the end of next week, he either did not think seriously of what he was saying or he himself had no belief in the statement which he was making. The honorable gentleman talked about the people being bound in chains. There is no freer people under the sun than the people of New Zealand; and long be it so. Any action I can ever take in this and any party I act with will never be in the direction of rivetting chains on the people. If they were bound with chains or fetters I should be the first to strike them off. To say that, because you give plurality of votes according to the rates a person pays,—which may fall on one man to-day and on another, the poorest in the country, the next day,—to say that by so doing you are binding chains on the people is a very great stretch of language, and is using the words in a sense that cannot be at all defended. The honorable gentleman has said that there are very few members in this House who have considered the changes which the country has undergone. I scarcely think that that is so. I think that most members of the House have considered the changes which the Constitution has undergone; but there is very little use indeed in harking back to the changes which the country has undergone. When the honorable gentleman was on the other side of the House he always kept telling us of those changes and condemning them, and all sorts of reproaches were hurled against myself because I could not see the propriety of harping upon an old theme long since past and gone. I recognized that the time had come when it behoved the public men of this country to do all they could in shaping the institutions that were to follow those that were gone. I had expected, when the honorable gentleman came to sit on the Government benches, that his first act would be to reinstate the old system, but what was my surprise when I found that, in the first statement the honorable gentleman made, he out-Heroded Herod in centralization! He told us that, by grasping still further in the hands of a strong central Government the various institutions that had been left in existence, the departments that had been left in the provinces by the late Government for the convenience of the people, still further reduction might be made in the public expenditure. I think that it would be more creditable to the honorable member if his language occasionally were less ambiguous. Whether that sentence was carefully planned or not, it is one which the honorable member or any one else might interpret in two ways. It either means that the honorable member believes in one strong central Government, and thus in a reduction of expenditure, or that he would rather have more Governments than one; but, if that is so, he cannot reduce the expenditure. If he means it in the latter light, then I say he has wrongly led the people of the country and the House to believe that there is to be a reduction in the expenditure. But the whole point dwelt upon in the speech of the honorable member was that there was to be a reduction in the expenditure, and therefore he necessarily implied that there was to be only one central Government, and that he had thrown aside all his provincial ideas; and when he is on those benches we find that all those ideas he had fought for so long are thrown behind him, and he out-Herods Herod in his centralization. Then, what is the use of telling us now that the provinces elected their Governors and had the power of making their own laws? It is very little use indeed to tell us what the provinces had the power of doing. He does not ask us to reinstate those institutions, and therefore it is no use to tell us what the provinces had the power of doing. The provinces lost those powers by a clear majority of the House, after an appeal to the people of the colony; and, if the honorable gentleman adheres still to the views he then held, why does he hark back in this way, after telling us a few days ago that centralization had not been carried as far as it ought to be in order to secure economy in administration? I do not think it necessary to follow up this subject further at present, although I could not help pointing out some of the inconsistencies in his remarks. The honorable member told us a few days ago that his was not an enviable position, and in that I quite agree with him. I say that a position acquired, as his has been, by delusive promises held out to honorable members, misleading promises to honorable gentlemen who openly protested, although now his supporters, that they would have nothing to do with any Government of which he was a member, is not an enviable one. Those honorable gentlemen declared that they would take no part in any no-confidence motion if the present Premier had a share in it. A position acquired in that way, and maintained in the way it is now maintained, is one which is not enviable, but utterly pitiable. Was it not paraded throughout the colony, immediately after the division, that, owing to the clever manipulation of the whips, the division had been taken at the right time?

Sir G. GREY.—May I be allowed to make a personal explanation? I did not make promises to any honorable member, and was not a party to any delusive promises.

Mr. REID.—I am quite sure of that. I did not charge the honorable member with doing so; but his position was secured owing to those promises having been made. He is too wise to do such a thing himself, and I am very glad to be able to say that I believe he is above it. But, as these promises were made on his behalf, he ought to have been aware of the fact, and ought to have had sufficient influence to put a stop to them. The honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) himself told us that, only forty-eight hours before the honorable gentleman was made Premier, an assurance was given that the present Premier was not to be in the Government at all. The honorable gentleman must see that if he does not himself give these assurances they are given by others. I quite agree that the honorable gentleman's position cannot be an enviable one. The honorable gentleman, up to the last day of leaving the Opposition benches, declaimed against the Government for centralization; and the first time he took his place on the Treasury benches he told us he intended to still further centralize. It is not creditable to an honorable gentleman who is in a minority in this House to say he will stand up for the rights of the people and the rights of the Constitution, while he sets at defiance all constitutional law and all constitutional precedents by retaining the reins of government in defiance of the representatives of the people, and saying he will not allow the question to be decided as to whether he is there as a constitutional representative or not. Sir, I say that that is a position which does not well become the honorable member. That is not an enviable position for him to occupy, and I am sure that I do not envy him his position in the slightest degree. Rather than submit to be in such a position I would not only retire from this House, but I would retire into the utmost obscurity. I should be content to spend the whole of my life in the utmost obscurity rather than submit to be in the humiliating position in which he is placed. That is not carrying out the will or desire of the people of this country. This House is the representative of the whole people of this country, and it is useless to say that we are not the representatives of the people here. The position he has taken up is one not in accordance with the dignity of this Parliament, and it is not creditable to any honorable member, especially to honorable members occupying the Government benches. I will not say more on this subject than this: The position of the honorable member is one that is truly unenviable. I should like to see him take up a position which would be more creditable to himself and more dignified towards this House. He should not countenance any further waste of the public time, any speaking against time, as has been pursued by honorable members on the Government side of the House the whole of this afternoon. It was patent to me that the discussions which took place this afternoon have been avowedly with the view of staving off a motion which is now upon the Order Paper. The discussions which took place two weeks ago were pursued by honorable members on that side of the House, not with the view of meeting any arguments adduced, but simply for the purpose of protracting the proceedings; and the question now before the House was brought up by honorable members with the view of still further protracting the proceedings. The last time this matter came before us it was adjourned for the purpose of enabling the House to consider the great constitutional question; but the next day that constitutional question was shelved, in order that a snatch vote might be taken on a division, because they had all their forces then at their command and were ready to snatch a vote. That is the way in which the proceedings have been carried on. It has simply been a waste of time. The Government can think of trying to carry on the business of the country knowing that they are in a minority. That must of necessity lead to a waste of time. The government is not carried on by fair Parliamentary means, but by tactics that would be disgraceful to the meanest Road Board in the country—tactics which no member of any Road Board would pursue. This is not a Parliamentary system that is being pursued; it is a system of speaking against time and of taking an opportunity of getting a division when the opportunity offers. Honorable members do not deny it. They tell us that they will not allow the business to go forward—that they will weary out members of this House, and by that means secure the Government in tiding over the session, to get members to go about their business, and have the recess to do as they like. When honorable members on this side were in office all their actions were done from discreditable motives. When those honorable members themselves get into office their action is the purest patriotism on their part. They do nothing from any sordid motives; but their opponents are the most sordid men on earth. Their opponents do everything that is bad. Those honorable gentlemen conduct the proceedings in a proper Parliamentary manner, although determined to cling to office when in a minority; but their opponents are not guided by any good motives whatever—their only object was to stick to those benches regardless of the public weal. The honorable member throws a halo of virtue around his colleagues; he has taken that position solely from a sense of public duty regardless of his own ease. "Does any one think that I came here of my own desire—that it is not in a true public spirit and for the interest of the public that I am here? Perish the thought. That is not the reason I am here; my reason for being here is that I may do good to the country." Everything that is patriotic, pure, and noble, everything that is high and exalted, is attributed to him and his colleagues; but the motives of every one who happens to differ from him are of the most ignoble and impure character. If the honorable member's motives are so pure, if he desires to uphold true constitutional and Parliamentary principles, let him discontinue conduct that will do more to destroy the Parliament of New Zealand, and to lower it in the estimation of ourselves and those who may come after us, than thousands of these memoranda that have passed between His Excellency the Governor and his Responsible Advisers. These things are as dust in the balance as compared with the honor and the dignity of our own proceedings here. It becomes the honorable member to set us a good example in that respect. If he is imbued with such high and exalted motives, let him set an example that will have a good effect upon ourselves and those who follow after us, and not adopt a course that will tend to undermine and destroy our constitutional system. I will not follow the matter any further. I hope that we shall come to a decision on this matter soon—that the honorable member will not persist in following a course that cannot redound to his own credit, and which I am sure will have a more serious effect on the future Parliamentary action of this Assembly than these trifling points of order and points of privilege which have been so often raised during the present session.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—We have heard the honorable member for the Taieri at his best. I think both sides of the House have enjoyed the vigorous and racy language in which he has expressed his long-pent-up feelings and unburdened his bosom to the House. He has been told to keep quiet lately, and it has gone very hard with him. At last he has been brought to the birth, and he is safely delivered. The honorable member has ventured to say that the Hon. the Premier should retire to that obscurity which is so congenial to him—

Mr. REID.—No, pardon me; I did not say that the Premier should retire to the obscurity which is so congenial to him.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I was coming to that in another way. I can assure the honorable member for the Taieri that he has an excellent chance of being enabled very shortly to retire to the obscurity which he so longs for. Every one of us who have watched the history of the colony is aware of the great duties which the honorable gentleman has performed to this country—of those heroic works of colonization which he has performed—of the giant squattism which he has demolished—and we know that all these things would not have been done had he not been dragged with reluctance from the plough. It was well for the colony that he was impelled to do so, otherwise his ambition would never have led him to soar so high. It was utterly false, as we all know, that the honorable member was, six or nine months ago, kept in expectation. The Commissioner of Crown Lands; the Minister for Lands—which was it to be? He became Minister for Lands, and damaged his political reputation and deserted his party. The honorable member has no ambition, and happy will it be for him, and happy will it be for those who disbelieve in him, when he returns to the obscurity he desires. We have heard again to-night more of those verbal criticisms of the Hon. the Premier's speeches in this House since he has occupied that position. Member after member who attacked him with any force at all has been entirely open to this verbal criticism. We have had these criticisms from the honorable member for Totara, the honorable member for Wellington City, and the honorable member for the Taieri, all able and accomplished speakers in this House; and the whole burden of their song has been these verbal criticisms; and yet, supposing they were true, what did it all amount to? That when the honorable member, whom we, at any rate, on this side of the House, are not ashamed to call a statesman, gets up in this House and does not read printed documents to it, but speaks his sentiments and opinions in speeches of eloquence that cannot be surpassed, and when those speeches have been reported and printed they may possibly show a loophole for verbal criticism. But what have been the wretched specimens of speeches we have heard since I have had the honor of being a member of this House! A member of the Government gets up and reads a speech or a document that has been prepared perhaps by auditors, or by some of the clerks for aught I know, and it would be no wonder if verbal criticism recoiled against such printed statements. But the free speech made on the floor of the House; the free speech, eloquent with burning tongue, speeches to the country without the aid of printers' ink—if verbal criticisms are attempted in reference to such speeches, and with success only in one case where there undoubtedly is a double meaning, such speeches redound to the credit of the orator who delivers them. The honorable member has been taunted again to-night. The same charges have been made, but the honorable member for the Taieri gives them more point and force; yet it is the same thing over and over again. The honorable member has been taunted, and asked why did he not, immediately he reached those benches, reinstate the provinces? I think the honorable members who make that taunt fail to apprehend the subtle difference which was exhibited in the speech of the Premier—the difference between a statesman and a State quack. Sir, the quack would only exalt himself. His action would be: I have said this, I have always done this, and now I am in power I will force my views on the country, willing or unwilling. But the statesman, whilst he does not disguise his views, waits and takes his cue from the political instincts of the people, and in deference to them carries out their will; the quack, on the other hand, carries out his own views. If there is a difference between gentlemen and gentlemen, there is also a difference between statesmen and statesmen, and, until that lesson is learnt, even those honorable members sitting on that side of the House, who from their age and position ought to be respected by all young men in this House—until they recognize that difference they cannot claim from us that respect which, perhaps, their position ought to insure for them. The honorable member taunts the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government for using the word "chains," knowing that the expression was but figurative. But let me tell the honorable gentleman that he will very soon learn that the people will not trust themselves to those who are overburdened with anxiety to get over-wealthy quickly, and that they will free themselves from such chains. The people of New Zealand will very soon find that the process has begun of a liberality to which the word "chains" cannot be applied. I cannot comprehend what chain that was ever forged would hold that honorable gentleman if his instincts led him to go one way and his duty to his country led him to go another. We have had this wretched cant about this Land Bill. Is the honorable member not ashamed to force himself and his Land Bill on the House—that consolidating measure which everybody has decided was absolutely necessary long ago? If this House had the experience of the land administration of the honorable member that I have had, I think he would vaunt himself and his precious Land Bill a little less often in this House. The land demagogue of Otago! There are others who are equally favourable to a popular land law with the honorable member for the Taieri. If there is one honorable member of this House who, more than another, has sold the people with respect to the land, and played the game of the squatters, it is the honorable member for the Taieri. Time after time has he played their game; and whenever they wanted to make use of him they put him into power, knowing that through his weakness, his ambition, and that stroking down the back to which he is so amenable, they could get all they wanted. Talk about Sir Julius Vogel playing into the hands of the runholders, why it was nothing to that of his former bitter political opponent and now quasi master, the honorable member for the Taieri. He could not even spare us to-night that little allusion to another piece of his legislation—the Settlements Works Advances Bill. I believe it was my vote that saved his Bill; and yet he taunted the Premier and his party with having thrown it out by voting that it should be read a second time at six months' interval, and thereby deprived the colony of a measure which was in the direction of settling the land. "The honorable member at the head of the Government should have at once sketched out a scheme by which all those liberal measures which he has painted to the House at different times should be given effect to." That is the cry. Some honorable members in this House cannot even devise, much less execute; yet an honorable gentleman who can devise, and who, if he has time, can execute, as he has executed before, is told that it is a crime in him not to have executed in a moment that which they have not been able to devise during many years' trial. Then there is that other little bit of clap-trap about retiring for ten minutes and returning with a new scheme of taxation, and of bursting up the large landed estates. Every honorable member must be as well aware as I am that it was the late occupants of the Treasury benches who suddenly became converted to the necessity for a new system of taxation, suddenly impressed with the uttermost willingness to impose burdens in an equitable way upon the people. It was they, with the full power of their offices, with their officers under their control, and every paper easy of access to them, who, when they made those promises of what they would do, might at least have had a Bill dealing with a property and income tax drafted and brought down in a very short time. It is a very different thing drafting a Bill to deal with a property and income tax, and bringing it down, from treating it in detail and seeing that every point fits. There is nothing in that taunt. Then we are told that the honorable gentlemen on those benches have committed a great crime because, having been four weeks in office, and having during the greater part of that time been obliged to face a virulent Opposition, they have not been able to devise a policy. I and my friends thought when we were in opposition that we did know something; but we must give the palm to those honorable gentlemen. And yet the Government are accused of a great crime because they have not brought down their policy, although during three weeks out of the four that they have been in office they have had to fight at the point of the bayonet, as it were, with those who are now in opposition, and although, as I am informed, every obstacle has been thrown in their way by a few of their officers, and not the slightest assistance given to them by those whom they succeeded. We have heard in other countries of the outgoing Ministers being amenable to the ordinary rules of courtesy. We have heard of their saying to those who succeeded them, "You will find many and many a difficult thing we have been trying to unravel—many a scheme for the good of the people the threads of which must be in our minds. We proffer you every advice and assistance we can, and you shall have that loyally until you see whether you can do better than we have been able to do." We have heard of such things: indeed, some of us have dreamed that they are the rule. But what do we find now? A "kettledrum" held in the Government offices, and every paper burnt not absolutely a record that could be of any use; while there was a tacit refusal to render any possible assistance.

Mr. MCLEAN.—No.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—The late Commissioner of Customs says it is not correct. I did not accuse him of having any information to give.

No one can accuse him of that. Then we had another statement from the honorable member for the Taieri, that, forsooth, the offence of his immediate predecessors was a very great squandering of money, besides their position with regard to the letting of railway contracts; but all that was condoned. I suppose it was condoned on his accession to office. I think, however, that a greater accession than his failed to condone it. Even that little waiver of political precedence last year failed; and it is not condoned to this day. We are told that the Assembly condoned it; but I say the Assembly is the servant of the people. It received a trust, and has not given an account of it; but it will very shortly have to do so, and then honorable members will have to account on the hustings for their action. It will then be seen whether past offences have been condoned because, owing to fortuitous circumstances, a majority of the House craves after that which destroys the real life of Parliament—a continual coalition of parties in office. The honorable member at the head of the Government was further accused of speaking over this House to the people. I can understand the honorable member for the Taieri, who would create a fifth of a man or a tenth of a man, if he had his way, so long as property, which is all in all to him, is safe, dreading that any voice in this House should reach the people of the country. I have always maintained that the honorable member for the Taieri is in his proper place on that side of the House. There is no honorable member here whose instincts are so conservative as those of the honorable member for the Taieri. Like all self-made men, he is proud of being so, and despises those with whom he was once on a level. It is the curse of advancement that those who advance by their own exertions despise those from whom they have advanced. The late Lord Derby was considered to be a most conservative man, but he never came near the honorable member for the Taieri as to what should be the rule in this colony. Lord Derby looked forward to a time when the colonies should rise in friendly rivalry with the United States; when, freed from the fetters which bound them in the old country, freed from the vested rights which hampered them on all sides and made them less important than they should have been, these young colonies might begin de novo, as he called it, and strike out a fresh path, unfettered by old prejudices, in friendly rivalry with the United States. That sounds well, but it would not at all suit the honorable member for the Taieri. I am glad to see him on that side of the House. We are gradually getting the House divided, and in a short time there will be no question as to what is a party and what is the line to be drawn to distinguish parties. There will be so marked a division that he who oversteps the line, who votes in one way one day and the next day in another, will never, after his first appeal to the tribunal which placed him here, have an opportunity of again abusing his trust. The question before the House, which I confess I have strayed very far from in following the honorable gentleman, deserves a little more comment than it has yet received, and, weary as the House is, I cannot feel that I should be justified in not laying before honorable members, feebly as I am able to do so, my view of the subject. Sir, the taunt which we find in the papers that were read to us to-day, the taunt that has come up from the other side of the House at every turn, and the key-note of which, even before these papers were produced, was rung by the honorable member for Avon, has been, "Why did not Ministers resign?" Now, Sir, there is one reason, absolute and above all, why I think Ministers in such a position should not have resigned, and that is that they are bound to remain there to maintain the freedom of any minority that may become a majority in the House. It is impossible for any Government to hold office for a term of years—six, seven, or eight years—from the first time of a Governor's arrival in the colony, without the chains, which are chains indeed, invisible if you like, but nevertheless chains and bonds of sympathy which exist between man and man, whether Governor or commoner, being created and growing stronger and stronger, so as to make it very difficult to snap them in twain. There must be a feeling, a desire, on the part of those who are suddenly brought into association with each other, to advise and to be advised, for I altogether repudiate the doctrine that has been preached to-night that it is the duty only of Ministers to give advice, and that the Governor should not give advice. It is impossible, if such notions be created, with his old favourites hanging about his doors, and being met, not only by the one hundred and one hangers-on at Government House, but by the society of the small town in which Government House happens to be situated—I say it is impossible that such an occasion as this can arise without there being an embarrassment, to say the least of it, for a short time. I do not care who the Governor may be, he cannot avoid the desire that his new Advisers should resign in order that his old friends may return to office. If we are to admit the position that the minority, upon the first snub, are to resign their legitimate rights, I say that all freedom in this House is gone. But there is another light in which to put that matter, and it is this: that, if parties in this House were to treat each other fairly—if the party on the opposite side of the House were to resent any unfair treatment by the Governor of the party in power—we should arrive at a more healthy condition of political life, and practically we should be independent, which we have never yet pretended to be. In an able paper published in New South Wales this point is brought out concisely and well. The Sydney Mail, in dealing with the subject recently, said,—

"No Colonial Ministry has a right to dictate to the Governor as to the interpretation he shall put upon the instructions by which he is bound. That is the function of his superior officers. But any attempt made in a colony to rectify differences of opinion upon that point by the resignation of Ministers is an attempt to dictate."

Now, Sir, I will give a concrete example of what I mean. In Canada, Lord Metcalfe, the Governor, quarrelled with his Executive, or his Executive quarrelled with him—it is immaterial which—about this very exercise of patronage which is now in dispute. The Governor claimed very large prerogative rights, holding, as he alleged, the same position in the colony in relation to the Assembly which the Queen did to the House of Commons. The Executive of the day followed the course which has been followed by the present Ministry. They remonstrated with His Excellency. They advised him in a contrary direction, and, the House being trustworthy, they resigned. So far as the resignation went they established the precedent which is preached on the other side of the House. But what followed? The House was true to its rights and privileges, and for ten months Lord Metcalfe was without a Ministry. At the end of the ten months he got a scratch Cabinet together, but before the end of their first month Parliament was dissolved. The Governor's influence permeated throughout the country, for he was very popular and much liked; and, as Earl Grey and another eminent authority state, through the personal popularity of the Governor, the electors were favourable to him. A small Conservative majority was returned to support his Ministry; but what was the result of that? Let us again look at what Earl Grey says; and he is an authority on constitutional law. He says,—

Mr. De LaTour

"Though the difficulty of carrying on the government was thus obviated for the moment, as the party into whose hands he [Lord Metcalfe] had thrown himself possessed a small majority in the Assembly, this advantage was dearly purchased by the circumstance that the Parliamentary Opposition was no longer directed merely against the Advisers of the Governor, but against the Governor himself, and the British Government, of which he was the organ."

That is the necessary outcome of any such action as is now about to be discussed in this House. The Governor will absolutely screen his Advisers, whether he likes it or not, from the blame that might legitimately be attached to them. He himself becomes the object of dislike to a great party in this country, and the British Parliament will be regarded with feelings which we should reprobate. That statement is confirmed by an extract which I have before me from the "Memorials, Letters, and Speeches" of Lord Elgin, who succeeded Lord Metcalfe. I will not weary the House by reading it, but I may be allowed to add a word or two from the instructions that were given to Lord Elgin in view of the difficulties which had arisen out of the action of Lord Metcalfe, and which were intended purposely to allay the violent discord that had been created in Canada by his ill-advised action. Lord Elgin's instructions were to this effect:—

"Clearly understanding, therefore, that refusing to accede to the advice of your Council for the time being upon a point on which they consider it their duty to insist must lead to the question at issue being brought ultimately under the decision of public opinion, you will carefully avoid allowing any matter not of very grave concern, or upon which you cannot reasonably calculate upon being in the end supported by that opinion, to be made the subject of such a difference."

Those are the views of a statesman; but, Sir, it is clear from the papers laid on the table to-day that we have overruling us a power which is admirably caricatured in the frontispiece of a recent number of the Scientific American, where are to be seen two speakers at a distance speaking to each other from opposite ends of a telephone. The new form of government which is to override our Constitution is very well caricatured in that picture; and, if we are to have a Governor sitting at Wellington communicating with his conféres across the water, and concerting a general plan of action for the control of free peoples, I say that we shall have something that is repugnant to the action of statesmen who have made a name for themselves, and have not been compelled to go out into the world to seek rewards which could not be given to them at Home. The question has also been raised to-night about the Governor possessing the power of the King. What does Sir James Mackintosh say about that? Speaking in the House of Commons in a debate as to the powers of kingship claimed by Governors of colonies, and referring to the disputes in Canada, he said,—

"One dispute arises from the Governor claiming, in imitation of the power possessed by the King to confirm the Speaker of the House of Commons, a right to confirm the Speaker of the House of Assembly. This is a very ancient right, and venerable from its antiquity, and from being an established part of an excellent Constitution; but it is most absurd in a Governor of a colony, and it is a sufficient charge against him that on such a claim he is engaged in a battle with the representatives of the people; and it is most unfortunate for the Governor that the only time when this right was brought into question in England was one of the worst periods and under one of the worst Kings."

I have quoted these precedents in advance of the debate which is to take place, as they may lead others of experience on constitutional history to refer to the cases to which I have alluded, in order that they may see the maxims and precedents that have been laid down, and which certainly should weigh in our time. There is one other remark I wish to make, and it is this: we find here a chain of facts which make those who, like myself, are anxious to respect the position in which we find ourselves, with one people, one colony, and one centre—I say it makes us dread the position in which we now are, and which we are afraid to accept if we could. Sir, if the Government of the day is to be at the mercy of unofficial persons in the central town of the colony; if we find a large section of the House arrayed against the Government we have been loyally supporting, simply because its members do not happen to be mixed up in certain circles in Wellington; if every man is to be influenced against them by that subtle and spurious aristocracy which must be the outgrowth of residence in all central towns for many years to come; if there is to be no fair-play, no honesty, no loyal service to the Government of the day by those under them on account of those influences; if Government House itself, as containing the representative of Royalty, is not to be sacred against those hateful back-stair influences which lead to the disclosure of that which should be known only to the Government of the day—I say, if that is to be the case, and I give this as a warning, the time is not far distant when the people resident at the two ends of the colony will realize their proper position, and in all loyalty say, "We will none of it. We will respect ourselves, our insular position, and our representatives as they ought to be respected."

Mr. REID.—There was one remark made by the honorable member who has just sat down to which I would ask the permission of the House to refer. The honorable gentleman said that before we went out of office we destroyed every scrap of paper which could be of use to the new Government. That is not true. When I see such a statement made in a newspaper I do not trouble myself about it, but when it is made by a member of the House it is important that some explanation should take place. I will say now that every scrap of paper which could be useful to those gentlemen was left in the hands of the Under Secretaries for them, and it would have been a disgrace to us if it had been otherwise. For my own part, I was particularly careful that everything relating to the department should be put in such a way that it would be accessible to my successor; and I should be most happy at any time to render him any assistance I could. In fact, the Native Minister once asked me to give him some assistance in connection with the Land Bill, and I told him I should be most happy to do so, and to do the same thing in regard to other Bills. I shall always be happy to render him any assistance I can, and I take this opportunity of publicly denying that the late Government endeavoured to prevent their successors from obtaining information.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I hope the honorable gentleman will consider that anything I have said which can be construed into a charge against the honorable gentleman is withdrawn. I certainly had no direct authority for the statement I made.

Mr. HODGKINSON.—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Major ATKINSON.—May I ask, Sir, what the effect of adjourning this debate will be? Will my motion of no confidence then be called on?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No. I will state that this debate has arisen in a rather unusual way. If it is the desire of the House that the debate should be adjourned, I will, after it has been so adjourned, state to the House my opinion regarding the question which the honorable member for Egmont raised before this debate began.

Debate adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER.—When does the honorable gentleman wish the debate to be resumed?

Mr. HODGKINSON.—I move, That it be adjourned until half-past seven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. REID.—I move, as an amendment, That the word "Monday" be substituted for the word "to-morrow."

Mr. STOUT.—I think that that will be very inconvenient, Sir. If the papers are printed by to-morrow it would be far better to go on with the debate without further delay. It seems to me that the privileges of the House are of less moment to the honorable gentleman than the desire to get on the Treasury benches. I regret that the papers have not been printed, but, if they are ready to-morrow, I do not see why we should not go on with the debate. I think that the best test the honorable gentlemen can give of their good feeling towards the country is to allow this matter to be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I do not understand the course proposed to be adopted by the honorable member for the Taieri, and I think it probable the House has forgotten what the actual question is. The real question now is, that the matter be taken into consideration at a certain time. If we were actually discussing the correspondence itself there might be some reason for the motion of the honorable member for the Taieri. I think honorable gentlemen on all sides of the House will agree that it would be better to resume the debate at the earliest possible moment. As you have said, Sir, the debate arose in an unprecedented way. We have not been told why the papers have not been printed, but no doubt they will be ready to-morrow, and we can then go on with the debate. I am averse to sitting at all to-morrow, as it is a public holiday; but, if we are to sit, I should be pleased if we could resume the discussion at half-past two o'clock, instead of in the evening. The sooner the thing is over the better. I must express my surprise at the delay which has occurred in regard to the printing of the papers.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I believe, Sir, that the papers are already in the hands of the Printer, and in all probability they will be in the hands of honorable gentlemen between two and three o'clock to-morrow afternoon. Such being the case, honorable gentlemen will have an opportunity of reading up the subject, and they will be in a position to deal with the matter when the House meets in the evening. I do not see that anything would be gained by postponing the question till Monday, unless the object be to hinder its being dealt with until after the English mail has left. I cannot understand the request for delay, unless that is the object. I hope we shall decide to go on with the discussion to-morrow.

Question put, "That the word 'Monday,' proposed to be inserted, be so inserted."

Mr. REES.—The honorable member for Egmont has announced the determination of the Opposition to stop everything. I think I may safely say that we will manage to last out the honorable gentlemen on the other side. The honorable member the ex-Premier having stated to-night publicly to this House and to the country that he will stop all public business until his great resolution No. 3 is disposed of—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think it very undesirable to now open up large subjects, and stray from the immediate question, That the word proposed to be inserted be so inserted.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I intend to enter my protest against this waste of time on the part of the Opposition. I say that the honorable member for Egmont has wasted the time of the country. First of all the honorable member tabled a vote of want of confidence before the members of the Government had the least opportunity to lay their policy before the country; then just as the Government were going to put forth their policy; again, after that vote was disposed of, another motion is tabled; and now to-night, when a question of privilege comes up, the honorable member for Egmont, refuses to allow that question to be taken to-morrow, and seeks to delay it until Monday, and thus to prevent the Government from bringing forward their policy and laying it before the country. I trust that the people of the colony, when we go to the country, will mark their disapproval of the conduct of those honorable gentlemen.

Mr. SUTTON.—Those honorable gentlemen who charge the Opposition with wasting the time of the country surely forget that this afternoon they carried on a division the adjournment of the House until to-morrow, the Government desiring not to sit until Monday, and that the honorable member for Egmont has expressed the willingness of honorable members on this side of the House to sit on Saturday as well as on Friday.

Mr. HAMLIN.—It is really refreshing to hear the honorable gentleman protest, in a fit of virtuous indignation, that the Opposition has not persistently delayed the business of the country. They do not like that charge to be laid to their door, and, despite their attempts to set it aside, they have most ignominiously failed to do so. All their oratory and all their ability fail, and they have to collapse, and cannot give one good reason why the Assembly has been kept here for the last four months. Had the late Government known what was required by the country, we no doubt should have been home two months ago. But the miserable abortions which they brought down to us, and which they threw on the table of this House as Bills, were such abortions that they themselves were afraid to face—

Mr. GIBBS.—I rise to a point of order. I think the word the honorable member has just used is hardly a proper one, and that he is travelling beyond the question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member for Franklin is straying very much from the point. The points he is referring to are likely, if dwelt upon, to lead to further loss of time. As to the choice of words, it is a matter of taste; but the honorable member is pursuing a course quite wide of the question now before the House, and one which cannot, by any stretch of indulgence, be regarded as pertinent.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I thank you, Sir, for putting me right, but I thought I was justified in referring to the remarks of the honorable gentleman who preceded me.

Mr. SWANSON.—I advise my friends to take the decision of the House, and to accept the last division and abide by it. Nobody knows better that the gentlemen who vacated those seats are determined to get back there again, if they can. I hope my party will be equal to the occasion, and will be able to keep them from those benches. Let us now, however, go in for taking the debate on Monday, and then come to a decision.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned till Monday at half-past seven p.m.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Owing to the very irregular position into which we have got, I shall have to detain the House some little time. I would not have remained in the chair so long had it not been for the point of order on which my opinion was asked by the honorable member for Egmont. Perhaps the best way in which I can illustrate the first point on which I have to observe is by stating what occurred. Immediately on taking the chair, and before I had called on the Orders of the day, the honorable member for Egmont rose. Now, that is contrary to usage. I shall read the Order, which is very clear upon that point: "When the House proceeds to the Orders of the day, . . . Mr. Speaker is to direct the Clerk at the table to read the Orders of the day, without any question being put." I had not called upon the Clerk to read the Orders, and the honorable member was premature in that respect. There arose a debate upon the point raised by the honorable member. The honorable gentleman proposed to make a motion. One honorable member after another got up and spoke to the point, and then the whole was interrupted by a message from His Excellency the Governor; and now we have arrived at this hour without my having been able to advise the honorable member. Then comes the question whether the honorable member can make the motion he proposed, which was to this effect: That all the Orders of the day be postponed, in order that the House might proceed to consider Motion No. 3 on the Order Paper. I am supposing now that the Order had been called on. The Order having been called on, then comes the question, Was it competent for the honorable member to make that motion? The honorable member referred to a case that had occurred in 1872, in which, on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Stafford, the remaining Orders of the day were postponed, in order to proceed to consider Motion No. 3 on the Order Paper. That was a motion of want of confidence. That, apparently, is a case in point; but what I would point out is this—and here is the difference: that such a thing may be done, and a great many other things may be done, when two parties consent, but when one party disagrees the case is altogether different. In that case Mr. Stafford and Mr. Vogel agreed. The practice is clearly laid down in May as follows:—

"Facilities of this kind are conceded by Government according to the importance and urgency of the motions to be discussed, and the state of public business. They have generally been given to motions amounting to a vote of want of confidence in Ministers; but not to Bills of independent members which, if carried in opposition to Ministers, would probably cause their resignation, for, if such a principle were admitted, the arrangement of public business intrusted to them would be taken out of their hands."

The essence is that consent should be given. Here consent is denied, and the case is therefore not to the point. The other point the honorable member for Egmont relied on was taken from May, page 244, edition 1868:—

"In postponing the Orders of the day, it had been customary, until 1866, to read and postpone each Order of the day separately. But this practice was attended with the inconvenience of dealing, twice during the same sitting, with each of a long list of Orders of the day, some of which at least were liable to discussion. The later and more convenient practice, therefore, has been, by a general order, at once to postpone all the Orders until after the particular notice of motion, which is accordingly called by the Speaker, and proceeded with.

But the honorable member forgot to read the former part of that extract, which says,—

There lies the whole essence of the question. Notice has been given. The practice, until 1856, was to call on each Order of the day that was liable to be discussed. In this particular instance there would have been fifty-eight motions to make. This practice was found to be inconvenient. Then came the practice of putting the question in globo, That all the Orders of the day be postponed, in order that the House might come to a certain motion which it was desired to deal with. But in such cases notice has to be previously given, and that is the essential feature. The case is very clear to my mind. The honorable member's only course will be to give notice.

Major ATKINSON.—I may state that, in rising before the Orders of the day were called on, I was following the precedent established by the last Speaker. I remember a case in which I got up, and I was told by him that I ought to move the postponement of an Order before it was called on, and I think you will find, Sir, that that has been the practice in this House. Of course, if you rule that it is not right to move in that manner, we shall not follow that practice in future. I shall not dispute your ruling, and I give notice that to-morrow I shall move—

Mr. W. WOOD.—As a point of order, I would ask whether it is not now too late to give notice of motion for to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think it is too late. It has frequently been the practice just before the Orders of the day have been called on to give notice of motion for next day. It is well known that the practice has not been strict in that respect. It would be a very different thing if the Orders had been called on; but under the present circumstances I think the honorable member is quite entitled to give notice for to-morrow.

Mr. STOUT.—I would submit that, seeing it is the duty of the Speaker, under the Standing Orders, to do a certain thing at a certain hour, and that duty having been interrupted by the honorable member for Egmont, the question comes up, whether now, seeing that it is past one o'clock, any business can be proceeded with. As far as I know the practice of Parliament, that is quite unprecedented. I will ask you, Sir, whether it is usual to give notice at this time. I would only point out that if this practice is inaugurated the result on a future occasion may be that honorable members will be taken by surprise.

Mr. SPEAKER.—In fact, I do not now regard it as a quarter-past one. It is, truly, enac pro tunc. It is half-past seven in a Parliamentary sense, as we have not yet gone to the Orders of the day.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—Should I be in order in making a suggestion in this difficulty?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member will allow me, I see no difficulty.

Mr. MOORHOUSE.—I was alluding to the remarkable condition of parties in this House, who are obviously in conflict. I was going to say that, if the honorable member for the Thames would appoint any hour to-morrow or any other day to take the division upon the motion of want of confidence, without debate on either side, I would suggest that our party should take issue at once.

Major ATKINSON.—I will then move, to-morrow, that all the Orders of the day and notices of motion be postponed until the House has disposed of the notice of motion, That this House has now no confidence in the Government. If it is necessary to make any further motion as to this motion coming on first to-morrow, I move, That it comes on first, as a matter of course.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It can only come on in its order; it can have no precedence. The course adopted in 1872, to which the honorable member has referred, was taken after concert between the honorable member for Timaru (Mr. Stafford) and Mr. Vogel. If the Government consent, the motion can be taken first; if not, it can only take its course.

Mr. STAFFORD.—I would recall to your recollection, Sir, that no sort of concert or communication whatever took place between myself and Mr. Vogel on the occasion alluded to. It was entirely a spontaneous act on my part, and even the gentlemen who supported me on the same side were not aware what I was going to do. Notice was given by Mr. Vogel to bring forward a question of want of confidence in the Government on a day on which Government business had precedence. He could not have brought it on before the other business on the Paper without the consent of the Government, unless the House had agreed to suspend the Standing Orders. I got up and moved that the Standing Orders be suspended, in order to enable that motion to be brought on.

Mr. SPEAKER.—When I used the word “concert” I did not mean that there had been any interview between the honorable member and Mr. Vogel on that occasion. I have quoted the words of May to show that one party cannot override the rules of the House and bring on business out of the proper order without the consent of the other. The Government are not compelled to assent to this, if they choose to stand by the rules of the House.

The House adjourned at half-past two o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 9th November, 1877.

First Reading—H. H. Lusk—Want of Confidence—Land Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Marine Bill.

H. H. LUSK.

Mr. LUSK.—Before the House proceeds to the business on the Order Paper, I desire, with permission, to make a statement, which I think the House will willingly allow me to make, with regard to a personal matter that has been dealt with by this House in my absence. It must be in the recollection of all honorable members that the House some considerable time ago—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member propose to conclude what he says with a motion?

Mr. LUSK.—I will formally move the adjournment of the House, if necessary, as it would ill become me to move any motion with regard to myself.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable gentleman rises to make a personal statement affecting himself and his honor, the House will, no doubt, as it generally does, permit him to do so. I beg, however, to express a hope that in such case the honorable gentleman will not say anything that would lead to a debate; otherwise it would be necessary for him to conclude with a motion.

Mr. WHITAKER.—I was going to ask the honorable gentleman to postpone his statement for a few days, in consequence of the absence of the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Fox). The honorable gentleman wrote a note to that honorable member a few days ago, saying he would bring this matter before the House, and might find it necessary in the course of his remarks to mention Mr. Fox's name. He said he would put it off for a few days in consequence of the vote of want of confidence that was then before the House, and afterwards said he would further postpone it in consequence of the present motion of want of confidence which is pending, and said at the same time to Mr. Fox that, this motion now being before the House, his matter would not get fair consideration. Consequently Mr. Fox has left, and is away at the present time; and, as I believe the honorable gentleman is going to mention Mr. Fox's name in connection with the matter, it would, perhaps, be well to postpone it for a few days longer.

Mr. LUSK.—With regard to the remarks of the honorable member for Waikato, I should like exceedingly to postpone this matter until Mr. Fox's return; but I regret to say that that gentleman is likely to be away for some number of days, and, as this is a matter of some importance to me personally, I feel myself in a false position in this House until such time as I can explain how the matter really stands. If I, in the course of my remarks, should say anything to which Mr. Fox should object, it will be quite competent for him at any future time—and I shall be most happy to give him an opportunity of doing so—to refute anything I say. I have no desire to say anything at all with regard to that honorable gentleman except in so far as it may be necessary to mention his name incidentally in the course of my remarks. As regards the position in which I stand in this matter, I think I am entitled to say that that position is one unprecedented in the history of the Parliament of New Zealand. I therefore trust the House will bear with me while I endeavour, as far as I can, without trespassing too much upon the time of honorable members, to place the matter in which I am so much interested in a fair light before the House and, through the medium of the House, my own constituents. The matter of privilege which was raised by the honorable member for Waitemata some time before I left on a visit to Auckland, was a question as to whether I had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House by engaging in certain work for the Municipal Corporation of the City of Auckland for fee or reward, that work being work done in the House. At the time that the notice was given, I stated in my place in this House that I regarded the matter as one which I had no objection whatever to an inquiry into; but I said at the same time that I had this one objection to urge—namely, that it was absolutely essential, owing to private business of a most urgent character, that I should leave for Auckland at the beginning of the week following that in which the motion was brought forward. That I stated publicly in this House; and I begged that, if any Committee was appointed, it should press on the matter, and conclude it before I left. When the Committee was appointed, I reiterated the request again and again to the Committee and to the Chairman (Mr. Fox). I may say that I was treated with much courtesy in the matter by the Committee in that they sat from day to day, and endeavoured, as I asked, to get the inquiry completed. But, Sir, while I think the Committee treated me with much courtesy in that respect, and while I say, as I believe has been stated in this House by the honorable member for Wanganui, that I felt I had been treated by the Committee with courtesy, still I did not think, and cannot now think, that the Chairman of that Committee treated me in the way I had a right to hope I should be treated. The Committee having reported to this House, their report having been printed and placed in the hands of honorable members on the Saturday previous to my leaving for Auckland, and I having again and again urged this as a reason for expedition, I complain that the Committee did not, through the honorable member for Wanganui, bring the matter under the notice of the House while I was here. It is a well-known maxim of English law and fair-play that no man should be tried and condemned without an opportunity to defend himself. That I conceive to be the position in which I was placed. At the sitting at which the first resolution brought up to this House was read, I told the Committee most strongly, and very irregularly, I believe, that it was my intention to protest in the most emphatic manner against the finding I heard read from their minutes. The honorable member for Wanganui and the Committee were therefore well aware that I did not in any sense consent to the justice of the finding of the Committee. They were aware that the finding cast upon me a very gross imputation of untruthfulness. If honorable members will read the finding and the evidence upon which it is based, they will see that I am accused of having made false statements in this House. Under these circumstances I think it would have been only courteous to me, and in accordance with a spirit of fairness, that I should have been consulted, and an opportunity presented to me of being present when the matter was discussed. The honorable member for Wanganui knew from the first that I was compelled to leave for Auckland on the Tuesday; and he should therefore have done one of two things: he should have brought the matter forward on Monday, previous to the discussion on the want-of-confidence motion—and it is well known that all matters affecting the privileges of the House or the character of any of its members are allowed to take precedence—he should have brought the matter before the House on Monday; or, having failed to do that, he should have given me an opportunity of being present when the matter was brought forward. I assert that the honorable member for Wanganui did not treat me in the manner in which I would have treated any other honorable member if I had been called upon to perform the painful duty of making a charge against him. I should not have said so much on this point but for the fact that I glean from the record of the proceedings of the House that a large amount of the argument employed in the discussion of the matter was grounded on the supposition that I was a consenting party to the finding of the Committee. I understand that many honorable members were led to believe that I had left for Auckland well knowing that this matter was to be brought forward in my absence, and that I was willing—in the consciousness that I had done something that deserved censure—that it should be so decided in my absence. Now I say, on the word of a man who has never been found to go back from his word, that I never had the remotest idea that such a course would be adopted. It never for a moment crossed my mind that, after insisting that this matter should be dealt with while I was here, it would be gone on with during my compulsory absence, and things stated which were most injurious to my character and most insulting to my feelings. The true account of the matter is the account I have given to the House. I was under the impression that at least notice would have been given to me that this question was to be brought before the House, and that such notice would have been afforded as would have allowed me an opportunity of appearing here when the question was brought on, and making my defence as I should have made it. I regret on that account that this was not done, because it placed me in a false and exceedingly painful position; and I regret it more because, if the precedent is followed up, it will be apt to lead to painful results in other cases. With regard to the question of the contempt of which I have been found guilty by a majority of the House, I desire to say that my position in this matter has been entirely misunderstood. I do not wish to appeal to the House by going at length into the whole question, but I trust the House, in the tenderness which it always feels for a member whose character is brought into question, will excuse me if I occupy a short space of time in endeavouring to show what the facts actually are. I have stated that extreme courtesy was shown to me by the Committee to whom the matter was referred. I have no quarrel whatever with the members of the Committee. The only person whose conduct has in any way aggrieved me is the Chairman of the Committee, the honorable member for Wanganui; but, while I say this, I must also protest against the terms in which the findings of the Committee are couched. As I stated to the Committee while it was sitting, the finding was entirely opposed to the evidence. I intend, with the leave of the House, to point out shortly why I say this. The evidence, I take it, has been for some time in the hands of honorable members, and I presume has been read by them. It ought to be read in connection with the statement I made to this House, for I say, and I say it very boldly, that there is absolutely no discrepancy whatever in any part of the evidence and the original statement made by me. The Committee found two things: first, that I had received £50 from the Auckland City Corporation for services rendered previous to and during the session of 1876 in connection with the Municipal Corporations Act and the Auckland Waterworks Act. Sir, there is no evidence whatever—there never was any evidence—that the latter part of the statement was correct. It has never been shown in any way that I received remuneration for anything I did in connection with the Municipal Corporations Act which was brought in and passed by this House last session. The evidence is exactly the reverse. It will be found that I absolutely state—and I take it that my statement before the Committee was equivalent to a statement upon oath—I state that I received no remuneration, fee, or reward in connection with the Auckland Waterworks Act. Where is the evidence that I did? It is stated that an account was furnished which contained an item for drawing the Waterworks Act for the Corporation of Auckland. In reply to that, I state that I did not draw the Act, I did not charge anything for drawing the Act, and I never received anything for any service in connection with the Act. And it is to be remembered that the account was not compiled by me, sent in by me, or seen by me; and, in addition, that it was never paid to me or to any one else. If that is not a sufficient answer to the statement that a person is to be held responsible for every item in an account made up by another person, I fail to see how any answer can be sufficient. But, Sir, there was more evidence. It is to me a matter of regret that a Committee of this House, dealing with serious imputations against the character of one of its members, should have failed to obtain all the evidence at its command. The question between the Corporation of Auckland and myself was a question in regard to which only two human beings were in a position to give evidence. I gave evidence as one of the principals in the matter. The only other person who could give evidence was the other principal, and his evidence was not asked for and was not taken. When his evidence was read in this House it was discredited; and yet I was adjudged guilty of doing that which I never did, and which the other person who made the bargain says I never did. How, I ask, is it possible for any evidence to be stronger than this? I shall have occasion to read to the House what the other principal said in the matter; but I shall now refer to the second finding, which was to the effect that "certain clauses appear, from Mr. Lusk's evidence, to have been inserted in the Municipal Corporations Act at the instance of Mr. Lusk, after interviews with the Government on the subject, which clauses the Auckland City Council desired to have passed into law, and for drafting which clauses Mr. Lusk was subsequently paid." But what does the evidence say? It says that "no clauses drafted by me were ever inserted in the Municipal Corporations Act." How then can it possibly be said that the finding was correct? I would read that evidence, but on the spur of the moment I cannot lay my hand upon it; but, Sir, I will state that in this evidence it is shown that the question was asked of me whether it was so or not. I was asked whether these clauses were inserted, and I said they were not inserted, but that they were handed over to another draftsman, who, in his turn, drew clauses which, although similar to mine in substance, differed altogether in form, and these were the clauses which were inserted in the Bill. What is it that a conveyancing counsel is paid for when he drafts a Bill? Why, it is simply for the form in which he puts his ideas. If the form is not used, his work, at all events, is thrown on one side; and I say deliberately and distinctly, since I have heard what has been said in this House on the subject, that no clause in the Municipal Corporations Act resembles in form any one clause that I drew. So much with regard to what is really and truly the literal question that was before this House. The literal question was, Had I been guilty of contempt of the privileges of this House by drafting these Bills and carrying them through the House? Well, Sir, the Waterworks Act was carried by me through this House, but for carrying it I received no fee or reward whatever. The Municipal Corporations Act of last session was not brought in by me, and none of its clauses were drafted by me. It was brought in by the Government, and was carried through the House with no more assistance from me than it obtained from many other honorable members of the House, and, as a matter of fact, with not nearly so much assistance as it received from some honorable members. I understand that I have been condemned on the strength of a particular Standing Order, but I fail to understand how that is so. I am bound by the decision of this House, and, if the House says that a certain thing is a breach of its privileges, of course I must consider myself to have been guilty of a breach of its privileges. But I think I can understand plain English, and in my opinion it would be a most unfortunate thing if the plain meaning of plain words, as set forth in our Standing Orders, is to be held to be wholly different from what, as it appears to me, it is. Let any man read as I read the terms of this Standing Order, which says,—

"It is contrary to the law and usage of Parliament that any member of this House should be permitted to engage, either by himself or any partner, in the management of private Bills before this or the other House of Parliament for pecuniary reward."

If those words have the ordinary meaning which is attached to them by Englishmen, they mean that no member of this House shall bring before the House or promote in the House any measure in which that member himself may be concerned for fee or reward. I was not concerned for fee or reward in any measure ever brought before this House. I was not so concerned in relation to the Municipal Corporations Act or the Waterworks Act, and no one can say that, with regard to any clause that I made a draft of, I ever took any part in the proceedings of the House. There were clauses in the Bill that were drafted by the Government draftsman, which closely resembled the clauses which I had previously drafted; but was it ever shown in the House that I had taken any action with regard to those clauses? I say that the Standing Order was never infringed by me. I am given to understand that the idea was that there was a law behind our Standing Orders which overruled those Standing Orders. I do not like to remark upon what appears to me to be an idea contrary to all notions of fair-play. If there are certain rules laid down by this House, does it become the House to say that these rules, although we have laid them down, are little better than a trap? Honorable members may be led into a trap because they do not know that the rules mean something more than they are supposed to mean. I understand that our rules set forth that it is only in matters not dealt with in our Standing Orders that we take into consideration the decisions that are reported from the English Parliament. With regard to this, I may say that I hold that where we have deliberately said a certain thing we should not be overruled by the English Parliament. I do not think it fair to myself or to any member of this House that he should be held guilty of contempt because he has observed only the Standing Orders of this House, and not those of another House. I think it will be confessed by honorable members that, so far as the literal accusation made against me is concerned, there was singularly little upon which to found the report of the Committee. I do not know what other things may have led honorable gentlemen to take a different view of the case from that which I should naturally have expected them to take on the face of the evidence before them, but I cannot believe that they did anything but what they considered to be right, especially when the result would be that a slur would be cast on a member of this House. It appears to me that it would be a most unfortunate thing for the House itself if we were to consider those who have been in ignorance of the somewhat doubtful meanings which are placed on the Standing Orders to be offenders. If every member who is ignorant of the exact meaning of those Standing Orders were deemed to be a criminal it would be a most unfortunate thing for the country. I do not wish to prolong the discussion of this matter, but I ask the House to consider these two points—namely, that, first of all, I did not do the thing which I was held to be guilty of doing; and, secondly, that the evidence taken before the Committee was only of a partial character. The Committee only accepted my evidence, and in opposition to that evidence a scrap of paper was put in; whereas other evidence might have been taken, and then the whole thing would have been made plain and clear. I put before the Committee a short telegram from Mr. Tonks, who was lately a member of this House, and who had been for some time Mayor of Auckland. The telegram I sent to him read thus: "Please state whether you agreed to pay me for promoting Bills before House last year, or only for professional work." His reply to that was, "I agreed to give you £50 for professional services." I thought, seeing that I had made a solemn statement of all the facts in this case, and seeing that I had declared that I knew nothing whatever of the account which was brought up, and with which I was supposed to have some connection—I thought that, when I had denied having any knowledge of that account, my word would be taken. This account was never recognized by the party to whom it was sent; it was sent without my knowledge, and it was never paid. I thought that when I stated those facts to the Committee the House would not dishonor itself by doubting my word. I did not believe that a Committee of this House would allow any member of the Assembly to be accused of telling untruths when he had made a deliberate statement which he considered as binding as if he had made it upon oath. I did not think members of this House would stand by quietly and see me accused of making false statements; therefore I never dreamt of getting an elaborate statement of my case from the Mayor of Auckland. But when I heard that I had been treated as I was treated, when I heard that things had been said which caused me much pain and which have been most injurious to my reputation, I wrote to Mr. Tonks, and requested him to state freely, as nearly as he could, what were the circumstances connected with any business communication I had had with the Municipal Corporation of Auckland. Before that time I had received from Mr. Tonks a memorandum, which has been already read by the honorable member for Akaroa in this House; but I had not the least idea that the matter would be discussed as was discussed, and I did not think that the short telegram which I read to the Committee was not sufficient. However, when I learned that such was the case, I asked Mr. Tonks, as the late Mayor of Auckland, to give me a free explanation of the whole of the circumstances. I got that explanation, and I have it here now, and, with the leave of the House, should like to read it. I may say I have had no other communication with Mr. Tonks on this subject; I have not attempted to refresh his memory in any way; and it is not fair to imply, as the Committee has done, that the statement he has made is in any way contrary to truth. I understand that that suggestion was made in the House. I understand that the suggestion was made that Mr. Tonks, lately a member of this House, was so base that he would, at my suggestion, affect to remember things that had not occurred, and give a statement to be read in the House totally contrary to the truth. Sir, what Mr. Tonks has written to me is this:—

"Auckland, 23rd October, 1877.

"MY DEAR LUSK,—The following is, as far as I can remember, the history of the £50 privilege case. Some time before last session the Auckland City Council required amendments to the Corporations Act, and it was intended to have a special Act drawn, but, hearing that it was the intention of Government to introduce a new Corporations Act, it was deemed advisable to have the special clauses we wanted drawn up by a solicitor for us, and, if possible, to get them incorporated in the Government Act. Your name was mentioned, and I was authorized to arrange with you. Accordingly, I met you, and after some conversation, in which I believe I asked you if there was anything to prevent your acting professionally for the Corporation, it was arranged that the clauses required were to be drafted by you for the sum of £50. After you arrived at Wellington, you either telegraphed or wrote, or both, asking for a Parliamentary agent to be sent down, and Mr. Stevenson was accordingly engaged and sent down for that purpose. Shortly after my return from Wellington I was informed that an account for £66 odd had been sent in to the Corporation for payment. I don't think I saw the account, but, in consequence of hearing of it, I waited on you, and reminded you of our agreement, which you at once admitted. The £50 was accordingly voted by the Council, and I presume in due course handed to you. I do not know that I can add anything to this plain statement of bare facts, but simply to hope that it may be of use to you.—I am, &c., "B. TONKS.

"P.S.—It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to say that in no way did our negotiations tend towards influencing your vote in the House, nor was it any part of our bargain that you should obtain any support to our views. Anything you may have done to secure such support was quite voluntary on your part.

"B. TONKS.

Now, that is not a statement elicited by me from Mr. Tonks—not a statement which I asked him to make in order to get me out of any difficulty. I could not so have insulted a gentleman in his position, nor should I consider myself base enough to attempt such a thing. I would not insult him by supposing him capable of being a participator in what is little better than a crime. That is a plain statement of the matter, so far as

Mr. Tonks remembered it; and it will be found, on looking at the evidence given by me, that that plain statement of bare facts in every way tallies with the statement made by me before the Committee. It has been said that I came to Wellington and endeavoured to get this Bill that I had drawn embodied in the Government Bill; that I saw Sir Julius Vogel, then Premier of the colony; that I urged on him the doing of this; that for these things I charged money; and that, therefore, I was promoting the Bill before this House. It may possibly be that, had I done all this, I should have been promoting the Bill before the House, and have left myself open to the charge of doing that for which the House has thought fit to visit me with, I suppose, as severe a punishment as the House could well have inflicted upon a man who was really guilty. But what are the facts? £50 was offered to me for drafting certain clauses which were intended to be used by the Corporation; £50 was paid for doing that which Mr. Tonks has stated, and I have sworn it was not paid for anything beyond that. When I came to Wellington, when I saw Sir Julius Vogel, and when I did all the things which I freely admit that I did with the view of advancing what I thought were very worthy objects on the part of the Corporation of Auckland—I say, when I did all this, I did it, as Mr. Tonks has stated, absolutely gratuitously, absolutely out of goodwill. I told the Committee, in evidence, that I was entitled to the £50 before ever I came to Wellington, and before ever I saw Sir Julius Vogel at all. My work was done at the moment when I had drafted these clauses for the Act, and when these clauses were accepted by the Mayor of Auckland and the Committee of the Council as being satisfactory for their purpose. Then I was entitled to receive the money, and then the bargain was concluded. If I came to this House and afterwards exerted myself, it was not as a paid solicitor, but it was as a member for the Province of Auckland who really believed that it was desirable that certain things should be done. I say, without the slightest hesitation, that no one can go through the evidence and show that I did anything that was wrong in intention. But I may go further. It has been said, Sir, by yourself in this House—and I have to express to you my thanks for your having stated that in the chair which we all know to be perfectly correct, but which comes with peculiar force when stated by you, from your great knowledge, your long experience, and your high position—I say I feel exceedingly obliged to you for stating that which we all know to be true—namely, that that which I did has been habitually done in all time since this Assembly existed by legal gentlemen who held seats in it. It does appear to me a strange thing that the House should, in this year of grace 1877, have suddenly discovered that a great breach of its privileges had been committed, that there was a gross contempt of Parliament being committed by one member, one young member, inexperienced in the ways of this House, by his drafting a Bill which afterwards came before the House. It did not require to be a young member of the House to do this. The oldest legal members have done it. They have done it every year. The honorable member for Waikato did it last year. And it was stated by the honorable member for Auckland City East—he stated it like a man and a gentleman—it was stated by him that he did it last year. The honorable member who sits on the Government benches, Mr. Sheehan, stated that he did it, or, rather, that he agreed to do it, which is almost as large a contempt. When I find that last year one of the oldest members of this House, who has been Attorney-General of the colony time and again, who should have known if he was doing anything wrong, did the very thing I was charged with doing—

Mr. WHITAKER.—If the honorable gentleman is alluding to me, I can only say that his statement is incorrect. I did not draft a Bill, and, if I did, I did not get paid for it at all events.

Mr. LUSK.—I expected the honorable member would say so. I do not know whether the honorable member received the money or not, but the money was paid to the firm of Whitaker and Russell. I know that £33 was paid for drafting a Bill for the Harbour Board of the Thames; and a further payment of £3 5s. 6d. for clerk's fees was made. That money was paid; at all events the books of the Board show it to have been paid. I do not know whether the honorable member was aware of it; I do not say that he was; I do not know anything about that. But I state plainly what is a fact, and, if the honorable member will turn to the Thames Advertiser of the 12th May of last year, he will find a very full and very remarkable report bearing upon the whole matter—a report which I do not think it is my place to bring before the House. I have no revengeful feelings towards any member of this House. I should consider that I was acting a contemptible part if, because I think I have been treated with extraordinary harshness and with some degree of unintentional injustice, I were to turn round and assail honorable members in all directions in this House, and say that because I have been punished I would have them all punished as I was. I trust that my feeling of respect for myself will at all times keep me from so low a mode of answering what appears to me to be the very unjust charge brought against me. I have no desire to do this. I only mentioned the honorable gentleman as an instance; he was only one of many. As you yourself stated, the House has never taken up this position before. It has never visited upon the legal members of the House any kind of displeasure before this time. It has been a constant custom, an unchallenged custom, of members of this House, of old members, to do this work; and, however undesirable it may be—I agree, upon consideration, that it is undesirable that this should be done—however undesirable it may be, it does appear to me to be a very singular thing that perhaps one of the very youngest and newest members of this House, almost before he had taken his seat in the House, indeed, actually before he had taken his seat, should be held to be guilty of contempt of this House for doing that which, after all, appears on the face of it to be in accordance with the Standing Order. It is not my desire in any way to appeal to the mercy of this House. I do not think that, had I been here when this question was discussed, I should have made any appeal ad misericordiam to this House at all. I do not think that I should have taken up that position and cried, "Peccavi; deal lightly with me, because I am a young man or a young member." It would not become me to do this in the face of the fact which we all know—that I have not been alone in this, that I have only done what other people have been constantly doing. I say it would not become me, although I feel exceedingly obliged to many honorable members of this House—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not wish to interrupt the honorable member, or desire that he should omit anything from his statement which he thinks material, but I think the honorable gentleman is occupying a rather long time in making his personal explanation.

Mr. LUSK.—I admit that I have been a long time, and I regret that it is necessary to be a long time; but, if you will permit me to say so, it appears to me that if ever indulgence should be granted to a member of the House that indulgence would come with a singularly good grace on the present occasion, and I will appeal to members of the House whether they consider that, in the statement I have been making, or in the manner in which I have made it, I do not deserve to be heard to the end with all the patience which the House can find in its heart to give me. I have no desire to make a much longer statement, and least of all do I desire to say anything in the way of recrimination. If I have said anything in regard to other honorable members it has not been with any idea of recriminating. It has been merely with the idea of putting myself right with the House, and putting myself right with my constituents, who, of course, read what is said in this House, and who will naturally think, from the course adopted by the House towards me, that I was guilty of something most exceptional and most improper. I conceive that I was guilty of nothing exceptional. I conceive that throughout this House every member knows that what I did do was less a breach of the Standing Orders than that which is done every session by members of my own profession, who are never found fault with or punished in any way for doing it. If that be so, I am entitled to say that it does appear to me that I have been treated with great harshness, when it is considered that, even had I intended to do what I ought not to have done, supposing it was admitted that I had intended to bring in the clauses I drafted for the Council, and had intended to pass them through this House—the fact that I never did bring them in, that I never did pass them through the House, and the fact that there was not a tittle of evidence to show that I took any part in passing such clauses through the House, should certainly have weighed to make it appear that my case, however desirable it might be to use it as a means to establish a precedent in the House, should at least not be used for inflicting a punishment upon a member which, to those who did not understand the matter, might have somewhat the appearance of a vindictive punishment. Sir, I am not praying the House to reconsider its decision. I am not arguing in order that the fine imposed on me should be remitted. I am merely stating what appeared to be the reasons why, had I had the opportunity, which I believe I was equitably entitled to, of being here at the time that the matter was under discussion in this Assembly—had I had that, then, as I firmly believe, the sense of justice, the sense of fair-play and generosity which always characterize a body of Englishmen such as this would have been extended to me, and that I should in no way have been treated as if I were a criminal for that which, at the very utmost, and in the very gravest way in which it could be treated, was but an error in judgment. Only one word, Sir, in conclusion. I had forgotten one point, and that was this: It was, I understand, asserted that I might very easily have put myself right if, when I had found that I was doing wrong, I had gone to the City Council and refused to accept the £50 that was paid to me. Had I believed for a moment that I was doing wrong—had I had the least impression in my mind that I was doing anything contrary to the practice of this House, anything contrary to the privileges of the House, those who know me know well enough that £50 would not have induced me to do anything of the kind. But I did not know it; and, in spite of remarks that were made here by the honorable member for Wanganui, whom, were he in his place, I should have mentioned in a very different way from that in which I have done—in spite of what the honorable member for Wanganui seems to me to have said in this House, that I admitted that I knew I was wrong—that when I came here I discovered that I was committing a breach of the Standing Orders of this House—I say there never was a case in which evidence was more misunderstood or more twisted than this evidence must be to leave any such impression as that. I did not know, I never dreamt, that I was doing anything contrary to the Standing Orders of the House. I knew perfectly well, not so much from the Standing Orders as from a general impression gained by what I had heard from members and from the Clerk of Parliaments in relation to another matter, that it would never become me to act as an agent in promoting Bills. But I never dreamt that anything I had undertaken to do, or anything I did do, was in the nature of agency in any way whatever. I accepted the £50 in perfectly good faith, believing that I was as thoroughly entitled to do so as I was to receive any other professional fee for professional work; and, in spite of what has taken place, in spite of all the unfortunate results which have flowed from that act, which, at the outside, was at most an inadvertently erroneous act, I am prepared to say that I do not consider that I did anything in the slightest degree morally wrong; and I can assure this honorable House that I never did, and never dreamt of doing, anything in any way liable to the charge of being in the nature of a contempt of Parliament. Sir, contempt of Parliament is about the last thing that I should be guilty of. I have the highest respect and reverence for the dignity of Parliament, and I believe that I can refer to you and to every other honorable gentleman in this House whether, throughout the two sessions during which I have had the honor of having a seat in this House, I have not, by my conduct as a member, shown that I have the highest respect and the highest regard and reverence for the dignity and the rights of the House. I have to thank honorable members for the manner in which they have received this explanation, and I can only say that I am very sorry that I should have been obliged to occupy so much of the time of the House.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. SPEAKER directed the Clerk to call on the Orders of the day.

Sir G. GREY and Major ATKINSON rose to speak, and Major ATKINSON sat down.

Sir G. GREY.—I move, That the consideration of the Land Bill be postponed until after No. 6.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The Order has not been called on. The question arises, as a matter of practice, whether any motion proposed to be made in respect to the first Order of the day is to be made before the Order is called on or not. My own plain reading of it would be that the House should wait until the Order is called on. I understand it has been the practice that any motion made in respect of the first Order of the day is to be made prior to its being called on; that the Speaker having intimated "We will proceed to the Orders of the day" is, in fact, a calling on. So be it, on the minor point. Then comes the question of two honorable members apparently rising at the same time. Do I understand that that is so?

Sir G. GREY.—No.

Major ATKINSON.—I rose certainly.

Sir G. GREY.—I rose first.

Major ATKINSON.—Undoubtedly I rose first.

Mr. SPEAKER.—So be it. I will, for the present, regard this as the practice—I am told it is the practice, although I do not see the reason of it—that, when any motion is to be made in regard to an Order of the day, it is taken to be a calling on when the Speaker intimates that he is about to proceed to the Orders of the day. Therefore, the first Order of the day having been called on, if the honorable member for the Thames thinks he has precedence, well and good. At the same time, if he has, and makes a motion, as I understand him to do, there is a motion on the Paper which is clearly capable of being brought on, I have no doubt, and, if it can be brought on, so it is capable of being brought on by way of amendment.

Mr. STOUT.—I would like to speak to a point of order. There seem to me to be two points involved in this matter. I am speaking now strictly to the point of order, because I apprehend that you, Sir, will admit that it is a most important point which has not previously been raised in this Parliament. The first point is this: There being a notice of motion on the Paper, that notice of motion cannot be taken out of the regular course. That notice of motion is placed on the Paper after the Orders of the day, and before this House can get to that motion the fifty-seven Orders of the day on the Paper must be disposed of. If this motion has precedence, then it ought to have been placed before the Orders of the day on the Order Paper; but, under Standing Order 71 you must direct the Clerk to call on the Orders of the day without putting any question. I admit at once, when the Order of the day "Land Bill—in Committee" is called on, the honorable member would be quite in order to move that each of the Orders be postponed separately. For instance, when the Land Bill is in Committee he might get up and move that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again; and so all the various Orders of the day could be disposed of. But until this is done, if we are to be guided by the Order Paper at all, the honorable member for Egmont has no more right to move Motion No. 1 than I have to move my Motion No. 11. I know I cannot prove this to the satisfaction of the honorable member for Egmont, because his mind is a little warped at present; but I am appealing to you as judge in a party matter, where two parties are, perhaps, rather excited, and I say that this notice of motion, standing on the Order Paper as No. 1, cannot be reached by this House until the whole of the fifty-seven Orders of the day are disposed of. If it could be reached, why should not Nos. 2 and 3, and other notices of motion, be brought on? Then there is another point involved. I understood you, Sir, to rule, early this morning, that, where Government business has precedence, that can only be got rid of by the Government consenting to its postponement. Now, in the famous case referred to in May, last edition, pages 255–257, where the case of Poland was being discussed, a motion was made to postpone the Government Orders of the day, and that was moved by Viscount Palmerston, who was then in the Government. He moved a motion asking the leave of the House. That is, the Government having power to arrange the business as it pleased, Viscount Palmerston moved a motion, and the House thought fit to disagree with that motion, and did not go to the Orders of the day. Mr. Horsman made a speech, reported in Hansard; and I would ask you to notice the peculiar circumstances under which that motion was made. Mr. Horsman explains the circumstances, and I may say that Lord Palmerston afterwards admitted Mr. Horsman's statement of the facts to be correct. Mr. Horsman said,—

"On Monday last he had the power of bringing it on; but he is requested by the Government to postpone it, and the Government, in the face of the House, makes a compact with him—in the name of the House, with the assent of the House, without a single dissentient voice—that if he gives up that right he shall have the opportunity of bringing forward the question to-day. In consequence of that compact he foregoes his opportunity; and to-day, when the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who is the best judge whether a discussion will embarrass the Government, comes forward to fulfil his promise, honorable gentlemen get up without notice, take the House by surprise, and propose that that understanding with the House should be violated."

That was, Mr. Horsman, after a division took place, complained of the conduct of the House in refusing to allow Mr. Hennessy's motion to come on. There are in that case three or four peculiar facts. First, the House had assented to this course being adopted without a dissentient voice. Second, the head of the Government had moved the postponement of Government business. Now, these are two facts that are quite dissimilar from the present case. That is not all. There is another case in Hansard, which is also referred to in May, in which Mr. Du Cane was to make some motion in reference to taxation. Sir James Graham brought the matter before the House, and he urged that the motion should not be moved until it rightfully had precedence of the Orders of the day; and the Speaker concurred in this view.—(English Hansard, Vol. 156.) The first point I would put is this: This notice of motion, appearing on the Order Paper as Notice No. 1, cannot be taken out of the regular course. I submit that, if it were, it would be quite unparalleled in the annals of this Parliament. I defy the honorable member for Egmont to cite a single precedent in which that has been done. Of course we know that the Orders of the day may be postponed by the universal consent of the House and the consent of the Government. The second point is this: that, as Standing Order 71 says that Government business shall have precedence on this day, and no question is to be put by you on calling on the Orders of the day—and, consequently, as no question has been put, no amendment whatever can be moved—I submit that, before this notice of motion can be discussed, there must be a suspension of Standing Orders under Standing Order 71. I submit that on both those grounds my contention is correct; and I hope that, however bitter and irritated some honorable members who are longing for office may be, they will consider this matter of order and precedence and the conduct of our business as even more important than party fights.

Mr. REES.—Speaking to the point of order, I would indorse everything that has fallen from the last honorable member, because it would absolutely defeat, without any hope of the aversion of that defeat, the order of business in this House if any such notice of motion is permitted to be taken out of the regular course before the Government Orders of the day. Honorable members will at once see that then, in order to entitle any motion to precedence over all other motions and Orders of the day, it would only be necessary to word a motion to this effect: To move, on the first Order of the day being called on, that so-and-so. This would defeat the whole of our Standing Orders and the whole of our Parliamentary practice. If the honorable gentleman had known Parliamentary practice he might have put a notice on the Supplementary Order Paper that, on the first Order of the day, he would move an amendment to the effect that the House has no confidence in the Government. But this notice of motion is on the Order Paper: it is not an amendment at all, but a substantive motion. It may be said that the purpose of giving this notice of motion may be defeated unless it is allowed to be put now. But a member might put an impossibility on the Order Paper—such as putting on Friday's Order Paper a notice that he will move something on the previous Thursday. This motion is an impossibility, because, as the honorable member for Dunedin City pointed out, before this notice of motion can be reached upon a Government day the Orders of the day must be exhausted. The honorable gentleman might have attained his object in another way. He might have moved on Wednesday—when notices of motion would come first—that Orders of the day should be suspended upon a future day. That might have come on in the ordinary course. Not only is the present proposal against Parliamentary practice, but it is revolutionary. I understood you, Sir, to say that there was such a practice as would admit the possibility of a notice of motion being called on before the Orders of the day. I apprehend that there is no such practice in this House or the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not wish to be misunderstood by the honorable member. All I stated with respect to practice was that, the Speaker having intimated that the House would proceed to the Orders of the day, that was a sufficient calling on to permit of any one making a motion. I stated that I understood that to be the practice, although I did not myself understand the rationale of it.

Mr. REES.—That is the practice only in certain cases of privilege—cases of that sort which take precedence, by the right of the House itself, of all other business. But I submit to you, Sir, absolutely that there is not a single instance of an infraction of the rule that on a Government day Government business takes precedence of notices of motion and all other business. If a question of privilege arises, or a statement like that of the honorable member for Franklin intervenes, or a message from the Governor is brought down, they supersede the Orders of the day for the time. That may be the general rule; but there has never been in this House or in the English Parliament any instance of a notice of motion being brought on before the Orders of the day on a Government day. We shall have not only to suspend the Standing Orders to allow it to be done, but we shall have to move formally that the Standing Orders be suspended. If the course proposed were allowed to be pursued, an honorable member would be in a better position than by moving the suspension of the Standing Orders if he simply gave notice, as in this case, that upon the Orders of the day being called on he would move that they be postponed. We cannot argue that until the Orders of the day have been considered. It is plainly laid down in sections 70 and 71 of our Orders of Procedure that, on days when Orders take precedence, Mr. Speaker shall direct the Clerk to read the Orders "without question being put." Therefore this motion is of no use, because there is no question upon which the motion can be put. Even if it were an amendment it could not be put, because the rule is, unless the Standing Orders are suspended, to call on the first Order of the day. According to this Order Paper, you direct the Clerk to read the Order of the day for the further consideration of the Land Bill in Committee, and you then leave the chair. If this course were allowed to be pursued, half-a-dozen notices of motion might be given for Monday next, and another half-dozen for Tuesday, and the consequence would be that not a single Government measure would ever be brought forward. One person could absolutely stop all the business of the House, even without talking against time, by simply putting a notice on the Paper, "On Monday I shall move, on the first Order of the day being called on, so-and-so;" "On Tuesday, on the first Order of the day being called on, I shall move so-and-so." And so on. Why, Sir, it is revolutionary—it is absolutely revolutionary. Honorable members must see at once that to allow this would upset the whole basis of our Parliamentary precedents. Such a thing has never been heard of. I unhesitatingly say that such a principle has never been propounded before. It is not to be found in any book, in any case, or in any debate. The Government on certain days has the privilege of bringing its business before the House, and nothing can stop it, because it is the special business of the country. Then, on private days—say, on Wednesday next—an honorable member sees thirty-one notices of motion on the Order Paper: what has he got to do? He has only to give notice that at half-past seven o'clock, on the first Order of the day being called on, he will move a certain motion. The thing is preposterous. An Order of the day would never be disposed of if it be superseded in this way by a notice of motion, unless a special order has been made, and that Order must first be moved for and discussed. Let the honorable member move the suspension of the Standing Orders—that I allow he can do—but unless he gets the Standing Orders suspended he cannot proceed with his motion. I do not know from what source you have obtained your authorities, Sir, but I unhesitatingly say that there is no such practice as that, on a Government day, an honorable member can give notice that, upon the first Order of the day being called on, he will move that all the Orders of the day be suspended in order that a certain motion shall be taken.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Speaking to the point of order, I think your ruling, Sir, was to this effect: that, upon the Orders of the day being called on, it was open to an honorable member to move that the Orders of the day be postponed, so that some particular motion should be taken. That has been done in this House on more than one occasion. The honorable member for Auckland City East argues that the accident of the honorable member for Egmont having given notice of his intention to do that prevents it, because his motion appears on the Order Paper. But surely, Sir, that is pure surplusage. The honorable member's right is just as good as if the motion did not appear there; though it seems to me to be more convenient that the honorable gentleman should give notice. It is in the nature of an intimation—not a notice of motion in the ordinary sense—by the honorable member for Egmont that, on the Orders of the day being called on at that particular period, he will move in a particular direction in regard to them. The mere fact of its appearing on the Order Paper is in the sense of its being put on the Supplementary Order Paper, and is a notification to the House of that which the honorable member intends to do, and which, according to your ruling, Sir, he has power to do when the Orders of the day are called on.

Mr. REES.—No.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Well, if that is not your ruling, Sir—

Mr. REES.—Is it your ruling, Sir, that it is competent to an honorable member to rise in his place when the Orders of the day are called on, and then and there, without moving for the suspension of the Standing Orders, to move a certain motion?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Probably it will be better to wait until the honorable member has concluded his remarks.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I understood your ruling to be that it was competent to the honorable member to move such a motion.

An Hon. MEMBER.—With the consent of the Government.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Without the consent of the Government at all. I conceive that the consent of the Government is in no sense necessary. I see the following recorded in the Journals of the House as having taken place on the 21st September, 1875:—

"Postponement of Orders of the Day.—Ordered, That Orders of the day 3 to 30 inclusive, on the Order Paper of to-day, be postponed."

Mr. BARFF.—For what purpose?

Mr. TRAVERS.—For the purpose of dealing with No. 31, I presume.

Mr. BARFF.—That is an Order of the day.

Mr. TRAVERS.—That is immaterial. It is for the purpose of taking any business which this House may think desirable. That the Government have the right to regulate the procedure of this House is an utter and absolute fallacy. The House regulates its own business, and not the Government. The language of the Standing Order is as clear and definite as language can be—that is to say, it is clear and definite to anything but party comprehension. It is absolutely clear and definite as a matter of English language, but it is utterly unclear and indefinite to those who, in the teeth of plain English language, choose to put upon it an interpretation which suits a particular purpose. The language is this: "The Orders of the day are to be disposed of in the order in which they stand upon the Order Paper, the right being reserved to Ministers"—of what? Not of taking the Orders of the day first—not of forcing upon the House the consideration of their Orders at all—but the right of placing Government business at the head of the list." That is the whole of their right. The list, as it stands, is the list of the business of the House, and the House has the right to regulate the mode in which it will conduct its business. The House can make any order it chooses in regard to the conduct of its business. The Standing Order does not say that Ministers have the right, not only of placing Government Orders of the day at the head of the list, but of having them considered in precedence of any other business. That would be revolutionary. That would be compelling the people to listen to nothing but what the Government placed before them. That would be placing the whole of the procedure of the House absolutely in the possession of the Government, and not in the possession of the House. But that is not the case. The Standing Order leaves to this House, absolutely and incontrovertibly, the power of dealing with the business in such manner as it thinks fit. That is the interpretation of the Standing Order, if it be taken in the plain sense in which the English language puts it. It says, "the right being reserved to Ministers of placing Government business at the head of the list in the rotation in which it is to be taken on the days on which Government business has precedence"—that is to say, precedence over private business, but not to force upon the House the duty of absolutely considering it, whether the House thinks fit to do so or not. I am satisfied that the ruling which you will give upon this point, by the light not merely of the true meaning of English language, of which you, Sir, are a perfect master, but by the light of reason in dealing with matters of this kind, will be that no Order of this House has ever been made; and the House has never dreamed of making an Order which would remove from its control the manner in which its business is to be conducted; and that your ruling on that question will determine the conduct of the business of this House. I believe it is in the power of this House respectfully to consider any ruling you may give, with the view of determining whether it would ask you to alter your ruling; but this House, knowing how clear and definite is the language of these Standing Orders in this respect, will not have occasion to ask for any alteration in the ruling which you will give on the present occasion.

Mr. BARFF.—The honorable gentleman says the language of the Standing Orders is so clear that it cannot possibly be mistaken. That is perfectly correct. I defy any one who has any of the common sense and brains to which the honorable member for Waikato alluded a few days ago to misinterpret Standing Order No. 71, which says,—

"When the House proceeds to the Orders of the day, on days on which Orders have precedence, and after the notices of motion have been disposed of on all other days, or on the House resuming at half after seven o'clock, as the case may be, Mr. Speaker is to direct the Clerk at the table to read the Orders of the day, without any question being put."

In this case it is proposed to put a question before the Orders of the day are called on; but before that can be done the Standing Orders must be suspended, and that cannot be done without the consent of a large majority, or without notice. Now, if the Standing Orders are to have no weight, why go to the expense of printing them? As a matter of fact, we know that all the oldest and ablest members of this House have for years past been content to be bound by these Standing Orders; and the language of the Standing Order that I have just read is so clear that it cannot possibly be mistaken by the youngest or most inexperienced member. Standing Order 72 then goes on to say,—

"The Orders of the day are to be disposed of in the order in which they stand upon the Paper, the right being reserved to Ministers of placing Government business at the head of the list, in the rotation in which it is to be taken, on the days (Tuesdays and Fridays) on which Government business has precedence; but such business, if not disposed of on those days, shall revert to that position on the Order Paper which it would have occupied if it had not been advanced as Government business."

It has been ruled for many years in this House that, whenever it was considered necessary to give more than two days (Wednesdays and Thursdays being the days upon which private business is taken), it could be done by resolution of the House, proposed either by a member of the Government or by a private member. On such a resolution being passed, we are bound by Standing Orders 71 and 72, and no infringement of them can take place under any circumstances. Not only are these Standing Orders sufficiently distinct in themselves, but we have also others which tell us that, where no provision is made to meet special cases, we are bound to take for our guidance the rules and usages of the House of Commons, which are very distinctly laid down in the authorities to be found in the library. There is nothing whatever, as far as I can make out, in the customs of the House of Commons that would for a single moment allow the Standing Orders to be virtually set aside without a resolution for their suspension first being carried. One honorable gentleman who addressed the House said that if this line of conduct were persisted in it would result in our proceedings becoming revolutionary; but let me ask the honorable gentleman what would be the result if certain other Standing Orders relating to contempt were not strictly enforced. The result, I think, would be that, instead of the tolerably strong language in which honorable gentlemen describe what they regard as shady transactions, we should hear language used which would certainly not be fit for the inside of a Parliamentary building. I say that, from the troubled expression which the countenances of some of those honorable gentlemen have worn during the time they have been attempting to keep back business—for from the day when they saw the handwriting on the wall which told them that their kingdom had departed from them, their countenances have indicated vexed and troubled minds—I fear that, if the Standing Orders are upset in one particular, we shall have those honorable gentlemen upsetting them in a manner that will turn this House into a bear-garden. I hope, Sir, you will see that very serious innovations will be introduced if the Standing Orders are allowed to be overturned in any particular. We are now witnessing a series of manoeuvres which are intended to produce a certain result—a result which has had no parallel in the history of the Parliament of New Zealand, at all events. I do not blame the honorable gentlemen for using every means to secure the end they have in view, but it is also the duty of members on this side of the House to withstand anything in the nature of revolutionary action.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honorable member for Wellington City has quoted a case where a number of Orders were postponed in the session of 1875 in order to arrive at a particular Order. It is quite competent for the Government to make a proposal of that kind at any time, provided they have the charge of the Order Paper for the day. According to our Standing Orders the Government have the charge of the Order Paper on Fridays, and, if they are not prepared to go on with any of their Bills, it is quite competent for them to move the postponement of those Orders, just as it is in the power of a private member to deal as he thinks proper with his Bill when it comes on. The honorable gentleman says the House has a right to regulate its business. I admit that, but it must do so in terms of the Standing Orders. The Standing Orders will be of no earthly use if they are not to be observed. They provide for such a contingency as the present. The Standing Orders may be suspended in order to deviate from the regular course of business, and they prescribe the course to be adopted in order to secure their suspension. I do not say that I have had as much experience as some of the legal members of the House, but, having acted for a considerable time as Speaker of the Provincial Council of a very important province, I have had considerable opportunities for discussing such questions as the present, and if I were in that chair I could not conscientiously allow the motion of the honorable member for Egmont to be put.

Mr. WHITAKER.—The honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) put the matter before the House very fairly. He made two objections. The first objection was that, the notice having been put in a certain position on the Paper, it could not be taken out of that order, and that the business before it must first be dealt with. The second objection was that no Orders of the day could be postponed without the consent of the Government. Three honorable members have addressed the House since then, but they have not added anything new to what was stated by the honorable member for Dunedin City. I shall, therefore, direct my remarks to his observations. In the first place, I think he is mistaken in his interpretation of our Standing Orders, and he is also mistaken in what he conceives to be the practice of Parliament. With regard to Standing Order 70, it will be found that it exactly describes the position in which we are now. It says, "Unless the House shall otherwise direct, Orders of the day for Tuesdays and Fridays are to be disposed of before the House will proceed upon any motions of which notice shall have been given." It appears to me that that settles the whole question. It says distinctly, "unless the House shall otherwise direct." It is perfectly competent for the House to direct otherwise if it thinks fit. The only question that arises is, whether this can be done without notice, or whether notice must be given. It appears to me that it would not be reasonable that it should be done without notice, because members might be taken by surprise, and the whole order of business might be reversed without anybody being aware that it was intended to interfere with it. But that the House has the right to direct its mode of business is perfectly clear. If proper notice is given it can deal with its business in any manner it thinks fit. Yesterday there was a discussion as to whether, after first postponing on notice the prior business on the Order Paper, Motion No. 3 could be brought on, and I understood you, Sir, to rule that that could be done. I think that ruling is correct; and, following it up, notice was at once given by the honorable member for Egmont that all the Orders down to No. 4 on the Order Paper for to-day should be postponed. Rule 70 settles the question. I shall now say a few words in answer to the remarks of the honorable member for Dunedin City on Standing Order No. 72. That Order shows that Orders of the day are to be disposed of in the order in which they stand on the Order Paper. If we are to recognize that, the motion just now made by the honorable member for the Thames would be irregular, because he proposes that all the Orders of the day down to No. 6 should be postponed in order that that one may be taken up. The Standing Order 72 simply means that there is a certain order in which the business should be taken, unless some alteration is duly made in the Order Paper. The Government have no right to deal with the Orders of the day as they think fit; all they have a right to do is to place the Government business at the head of the list, but that does not interfere with the power of the House to deal with the business of the day in the way it thinks fit. The fact is that by the Standing Order the Government are merely allowed to place their business in a certain position on the Order Paper. Now I will say a few words with regard to precedents. The honorable member for Dunedin City has given us one or two precedents from May to show that his party are in the right, but he did not quote the twenty or thirty precedents which are referred to in May and which go to show that the Orders of the day may be postponed. I have picked out a few of those cases at haphazard, and they appear to me to meet the present position. It seems to me that the House of Commons has the power, and that we have the power, of ordering that the business shall be taken in a particular way. May says,—

"If it be desired to give priority to a notice of motion on any day on which Orders of the day are entitled to precedence, notice having been previously given, a motion is made that the Orders of the day be postponed until after such notice of motion."

Again, on one occasion all the notices of motion and the first six Orders of the day were postponed in order to take an adjourned debate. It appears to me to be reasonable that the notice should be given. In volume 125 of the Journals of the House of Commons, page 89, it is—"Ordered, That the Orders of the day be postponed till after the notice of motion for leave to bring in the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill."

Mr. BARFF.—That was a matter of urgency.

Mr. WHITAKER.—The honorable gentleman is talking about a matter which he does not understand. It seems to me that questions of this sort are not exactly in his line. I say that there was no urgency whatever in the matter. In volume 127 of the same Journals, it is stated that it was—"Ordered, That the Orders of the day be postponed until after the notice of motion relative to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." That was a vote of censure on the Government for appointing Sir Robert Collier to the Privy Council. The motion stood after the Orders of the day on the Order Paper, and it was ordered that all the Orders of the day should be postponed in order that that motion might be brought forward. Honorable gentlemen will find all these cases quoted on page 256 of May, in the edition of 1873. I think that the extracts I have read confirm my opinion that it is competent for the House to postpone all the Orders of the day and notices of motion in order that a particular motion on the Paper may be taken up. It is also stated in the Journals of the House of Commons, page 250, that it was—"Ordered, That the Orders of the day be postponed till after the three first notices of motion relative to East India." And on another occasion it was decided—"That the Orders of the day be postponed until after the notice of motion relative to the Conference of London." That also was a vote of censure on the Government, and if the motion had been carried the Government would have retired from the Ministerial benches. The honorable member for Dunedin City laid great stress on the fact that this notice occupies a very low place on the Order Paper. Well, the honorable member for Egmont wishes to move, "That, upon the first Order of the day being called on, all the Orders of the day and notices of motion be postponed until the House has disposed of the notice of motion 'That this House has now no confidence in the Government.'" That motion is, as nearly as possible, in the form of those which I have quoted from the Journals of the House of Commons. It is very peculiar that he should so exactly have hit the mark which his motion was intended to hit—it is singular that he has so worded his motion as to put it in the same position as motions which have been dealt with in the manner I have shown by the House of Commons. The honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) says that the motion must be taken in the order in which it appears on the Paper. But, if we were to deal with notices of motion and Orders of the day in that manner, it would be competent for the Clerk to put them in the precise form which he thought fit; and then we should be bound by his action. The fact is that it does not matter what position a motion occupies on the Order Paper. That is altogether a matter of no consequence. We must deal with the business in a way consistent with our own Standing Orders, and consistent also with the practice of the House of Commons. It appears to me that, according to our own Standing Orders and the Journals of the House of Commons, it is proper that the honorable member for Egmont should have an opportunity of bringing forward his no-confidence motion. We have a precedent of our own. On the 28th August, 1875, Sir Donald McLean moved, That the Orders of the day be postponed, in order to proceed with the discussion upon the motion for leave to introduce the Confiscated Lands Bill. In that case the Orders of the day were postponed, and therefore we have a precedent in our own Parliament. I believe there are others. That the Government have absolutely the power of putting on certain days Orders of the day where they like on the Paper is beyond question. They certainly can arrange the Orders of the day as they please, but the House has the power to say that it will not adopt their arrangement. As a matter of fact, the only power they have is to arrange the Order in which they will take the Government business on certain days, but they have not the power to force the House to take the business in the order in which they have arranged it. I do not think the House will venture to ignore their own Standing Orders and the practice of the House of Commons.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Sir, there was a time, some years ago, when I rather prided myself on my knowledge of points of order, and I used occasionally to bring them up in this House; but since so many legal gentlemen have come into this Assembly my occupation has gone, and I have left other people to raise such points. But on this particular occasion I have taken some trouble in considering this point of Order, and I intend to put before the House the view which to my mind ought to be taken as to the position in which the matter now stands. I saw when this question was raised that there was mischief brewing. The honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), for instance—

Mr. TRAVERS.—I understand, Sir, that in discussing points of order honorable gentlemen should confine themselves strictly to those points of order. Matters of the kind referred to by the honorable gentleman have nothing to do with the point of order which has been raised. We are merely discussing a question as to the interpretation of our Standing Orders, and I do not think the honorable member is in order in making such observations as those he was just making.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable gentleman is clearly not in order in so doing. I think the rule that the points of order only should be spoken to, when they have been raised, should be strictly adhered to.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Sir, I submit to your ruling, of course, but I would remind you that the honorable gentleman who has called me to order may not have read the Standing Orders so as to understand them.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I never used words of that kind. I said that the Standing Orders should not be interpreted by the light of party. I did not refer to the honorable gentleman's side of the House any more than to this side.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I think I have drawn a proper inference from what the honorable gentleman said. When the question was raised last night authorities were quoted by the honorable member for Egmont, and he brought forward a case which occurred in 1872, at a time when a want-of-confidence motion had been tabled by the honorable member for Timaru (Mr. Stafford), for the purpose of ousting the Vogel Ministry. He read from the Journals the order made to enable the motion to be taken. It was done by the consent of both sides of the House, and by arrangement. The honorable member knows that very well. The same thing can be done again in the same session. I was here, and the thing was done by the consent of both parties.

Major ATKINSON.—The honorable member for Timaru denied that there had been any arrangement.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable member for Timaru must be losing his recollection. The thing was done by arrangement, and by consent. I will refer shortly to one of the cases quoted by the honorable member for Waikato—the case of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill, in the House of Commons. The order made was this: "Ordered, That all the Orders of the day be postponed in order to enable the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill to be now read a first time." That was a Government day, and it was a motion made by the Government to postpone their own Order, so as to deal with one of their own measures. It is an entirely different thing from the action of a private member who wants to bring forward a motion of his own. In every one of these cases referred to, the thing has been done by consent, and the best proof of that is this: that the honorable gentleman cannot show me a division taken upon any one of these matters. The thing has been done by consent. In the case to which the honorable member referred—a vote of censure upon the Government in the same House of Commons—no doubt the Government allowed the motion to be brought forward as it was practically a vote of want of confidence in themselves, and they did not go on with any other business; but I defy the honorable gentleman to show me a single division on these questions. If there is any doubt about it, I have before me the report of Hansard on the discussion which took place on the Peace Preservation Bill. It was a Government measure, and the motion to adjourn the Order of the day was proposed by a member of the Government, to enable them to bring in a Government Bill. I apprehend that we have the same right still. We could do so now. I have before me the report of the discussion that took place in the House of Commons upon a similar resolution and upon a similar Standing Order, by which it is shown that, so long as the Order was in force, we should comply with it, and prevent private business being brought in to intercept Government business on Government days. Practically, our Standing Order is the same, word for word, with the Order of the House of Commons, and I contend that the construction put upon it by the House of Commons is the same construction that ought to be put upon it here. In the first place, I may say that I agree with what has been said by the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers)—that the House has the power of guiding its own business. No Ministry has the right to deprive the House of this power. These are functions which belong to the House. But what has the House done? It has made rules and regulations for the guidance of its own business, and when we call upon members on the opposite side to adhere to these regulations we are insisting upon the rights of the House. I will take a familiar case. Can you contend for a moment that a majority of the House would enable you to put a money Bill through without its first going through a Committee of the whole House? The Standing Order says that such a Bill must go through a Committee of the whole House. Can the House abnegate its functions and allow you to pass it without going into a Committee of the whole? Take another instance. Suppose a Bill went into Committee and there received material alterations, would it be possible to dispense with the regulation which requires that the report should be considered before the Bill could be passed through the House? It is by consent that the amendments reported are agreed to and the Bill passed during the same sitting. As I have said, a money Bill cannot go through this House except through the channel of a Committee of the whole. There is no limitation or reservation of this Standing Order, and it cannot be suspended except by a majority of two-thirds of the House. There is no limitation or reservation whatever: and the same rule applies to the question now under discussion. With the view of pushing on Government business, two days are specially set apart by the Standing Order for the consideration of Government business, and we cannot depart from that Standing Order without first of all taking the proper step of repealing or suspending it. I appeal to your own practice, Sir. It is quite true that Orders of the day may be postponed with the view of taking some particular subject, but it is only by consent of the House that the motion for their postponement is allowed to be put and carried. If that consent were not given, and it were required that the Orders of the day should be called on one by one, you would be bound to have them so called on. You, Sir, so ruled last session, when the question was raised, that the Orders of the day would have to be read one after the other. I apprehend that the honorable member for Egmont is in a strait. His notice of motion is at the bottom of the Orders of the day, and, until such time as they are called on one by one and dealt with, he has no right to ask you to allow him to bring on his motion. For instance, when the Order of the day for the further consideration of the Land Bill in Committee is called on, it is competent for him to move that it be postponed until some future day. The House can deal with the Orders of the day as they are called on, and make any arrangement regarding them which it thinks proper; but I submit, with all confidence, that, looking at the Standing Order, it by no means gives the honorable member the right which he claims. If the honorable gentleman wishes to bring forward his resolution, he must bring it on in the usual way. I contend that it would be out of order for him to attempt to bring a motion forward by intercepting the business on the Paper. It must be quite evident that, if such a thing were allowed to be done, or if it could be done, it would be impossible to proceed with the public business. We are not speaking for ourselves in this matter, or from any consideration of how far it will affect us; but we are considering this position: that any Government placed on these benches may be prevented from day to day bringing forward their business if it could be held that a motion of this kind could be brought forward at once so as to intercept and suspend altogether the Government business. I contend that the motion is out of order. It cannot be brought forward until the Standing Orders are suspended or altered. And, even supposing you should rule that the motion is one that can be brought forward, I contend that it would be necessary for you to have each Order of the day called on separately, and put to the House, before you could call on the motion of the honorable member for Egmont.

Mr. BALLANCE.—As supplementing the observations made by the Hon. the Minister of Justice, I would call your attention, Sir, to a case stated in Todd, volume 2, page 323, where we have the following:—

"On April 30, 1868, when Mr. Gladstone brought in his resolutions for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, upon which he defeated the Government, fearing that Ministers would not allow him a proper opportunity for proceeding thereon, he gave notice that on the next Government day, at half-past four o'clock, he should move that the Standing Order above mentioned should be suspended, and the other Orders of the day be postponed until after the Order of the day for the Committee to consider his resolutions. But, as Mr. Disraeli undertook that ample opportunity for the discussion of this question should be afforded, the motion was not made."

This appears to me to be a case exactly in point. In the first place, Mr. Gladstone anticipated that the Government would not give him facilities for bringing on his motion. Then, in order to bring it on, he gave notice that he would move the suspension of the Standing Orders. Then, by arrangement, in the way the honorable gentleman has just contended, Mr. Disraeli, who was leader of the House of Commons, allowed Mr. Gladstone to bring on his motion. I think the case is one well deserving of your attention when considering this matter.

Mr. LUSK.—Although I have not taken any part in the discussion which has taken place upon the Standing Orders, I may be permitted to make a few observations which appear to me to bear upon the question that has been discussed at so much length by members who are much better able to discuss it than I am. In listening to what has been urged on different sides of the House, and on looking down the Standing Orders, it appears to me they do not bear the construction which has been put upon them by the honorable member for Waikato and other honorable members who have spoken on the same side of the House. Standing Order 70 has been interpreted by the honorable member for Waikato in a peculiar way. It says, "Unless the House shall otherwise direct, Orders of the day for Tuesdays and Fridays are to be disposed of before the House will proceed upon any motions of which notice shall have been given." Now, it appears to me, and I think you will see upon investigation, that this Standing Order does not mean that the House shall, upon a certain day, make an Order; but that it is a general regulation as to the mode of carrying on the business of the House—that, unless the House shall, say to-day, come to a resolution that the Orders of the day and notices of motion are to be taken on a particular day, they shall be taken in the way laid down in the Standing Orders; because Standing Order 71 says,—

"When the House proceeds to the Orders of the day, on days on which Orders have precedence, and after the notices of motion have been disposed of on all other days, or on the House resuming at half after seven o'clock, as the case may be, Mr. Speaker is to direct the Clerk at the table to read the Orders of the day, without any question being put."

Now, if the House desired to depart from this rule, to release you, Sir, from this duty which is thrown upon you, it has only on a previous day to come to a resolution to suspend the Standing Order, or even on that day to suspend the Standing Order, and on a previous day to regulate the way in which the Order Paper shall be arranged, and thereby relieve you from the necessity of obeying Standing Order No. 71. With regard to what has been said at considerable length about the right of the Government to place business on the Order Paper, the Government's right is derived of course from the Standing Orders of this House, and it has been ruled that the Government's right simply means this: that they have a right to put the business on the Order Paper in a particular way, which right we, when we sit here, have the superior right to take away if we choose. But the first clause of section 72 seems to do away with that idea altogether, because it says that the Orders of the day are to be disposed of in the order in which they stand upon the Paper: that is to say, that anything said afterwards about the right reserved to Ministers of placing them in that order is merely supplementary to the other statement—namely, that, Ministers having once placed them in that order, then the Orders of the House can only be disposed of in the order in which they have just been placed; and therefore it does not at all interfere with the necessity of proceeding with the business in the order on the Paper—that it is merely indicated afterwards how the business on particular days shall get into the order in which it is found. I merely suggest these things, because it appeared to me, on hearing the argument that was used, that there was a misapprehension in the mind of the honorable member for Waikato and likewise in that of the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) as to the real meaning of the Standing Order. On a question of legal interpretation, I might indeed bow at once to the superior experience of those gentlemen, but on a mere question of this kind I take it that no such experience is requisite to guide us to an interpretation of the Standing Order.

Major ATKINSON.—I only wish to say a few words with regard to the point raised by the honorable gentleman who has just sat down and also by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout), both of whom have given it as their opinion that it is clearly the duty of the Speaker to cause the Order of the day to be read immediately upon his taking the chair at half-past seven o'clock. During the many exciting times in 1875 there were two or three such cases. There was one in which you yourself, Sir, took part, and which arose upon a question of the present Premier, who desired to introduce a Bill into the House. The Government of the day opposed that, and the debate continued during the afternoon. At half-past seven o'clock, when the Orders of the day were called on—or, rather, before they were called on, apparently—Sir Donald McLean got up and moved the postponement of all the Orders of the day, with a view of continuing the discussion on the question of whether the honorable gentleman should have leave to introduce the Bill. A discussion arose thereon in which you, Sir, among others, took a leading part. The motion was opposed very strongly by the then Opposition, who, however, apparently from weakness, declined to divide upon it.

Mr. REES.—They agreed to it.

Major ATKINSON.—The House agreed to it, which is a very different thing. Honorable gentlemen will remember that the House was in an excited state at that time, and, as will be seen, a very unusual course was pursued by the Government announcing that they did not intend to permit the honorable gentleman to bring in the Bill. It is quite clear that the Opposition, had it been strong enough, would have divided the House upon the question of postponement. You, Sir, on that occasion, spoke very strongly against what you were pleased to say was a surprise put upon the House by the proposition to alter the ordinary course of business, and you were not a consenting party to the matter. I merely wish to point this out as showing that it has been the custom of this House to proceed to consider the question of whether it would postpone the Orders of the day. It is quite evident, from the tone of the debate that took place on the occasion to which I have referred, that the honorable gentlemen who took part in it were not consenting parties. The other point to which I wish to call attention is this: That Standing Order No. 70 clearly provides for this House disposing of the business. It only provides that the Orders of the day are to have precedence on Tuesdays and Fridays unless the House shall otherwise order. Then we find, by the passage from May which I quoted yesterday, that Orders of the day can be postponed upon notice being given. Now, it is quite clear that that would be almost nugatory if it were necessary to give a week's notice of an intention to move the postponement of the Orders of the day, say, on Friday week. Of course nobody knows what we are going to do on that particular day. It is evident that the object of the notice is that the House shall not be taken by surprise; and therefore I contend that, the Orders of the day having precedence, and my having given notice, it is quite in accordance with our practice, and with that of the Imperial Parliament, that when the first Order is called on I should move the motion of which I have given notice.

Mr. MACANDREW.—As this question will to a great extent involve the conduct of Parliamentary business in the future, and as it will be exceedingly unfortunate if a mistake is made now in regard to it, I think it is very desirable, seeing that so many points have been raised on each side, and so many authorities quoted, that you should have time, Sir, to consider the various questions involved, and, with that view, I would suggest a short adjournment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—May I ask, Sir, if the Order of the day has been called on?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I intimated that the House could not proceed with the Orders of the day. That is the exact state in which we are. I will therefore, as suggested, resume the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER then left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. HODGKINSON.—It is not my intention to go at any length into this question; but, on listening to the speeches which have been made, I thought there were one or two points which were not brought out, or at any rate not brought out fully, so as to have due consideration in the House. What struck me as a great omission was this: that, if the view advocated by the honorable member for Waikato and others on that side of the House should receive your sanction, the future condition of things would be somewhat like this: If it is ruled that a bare majority of the House can at any time set aside the arrangement made on the Order Paper, and bring forward matters for consideration superseding all other motions on the Paper, a tyrannical majority, or any majority, however small, would at any future time have the power to bring their own business to the front, and keep back altogether the business of the minority. That would be a very serious and great evil. For instance, I myself have several motions on the Order Paper which, in my opinion, are of considerable importance; but, if the argument of the honorable member for Waikato should prevail, it would be quite competent for a bare majority on that side of the House to keep my motions in abeyance until the end of the session, always bringing up new matters to suit their convenience or views, to the great injury of other members and of the public. Now, to make a comparison; If we consider our Standing Orders to bear some relation to the Constitution of any country possessing a written Constitution, it is a very wise and safe precaution that no alteration should be made in the law without a vote of a two-thirds majority. I am under the impression that to suspend the Standing Orders requires the consent of two-thirds of the House. That is a great safeguard and protection against the tyranny of a small majority in this House over a minority, and I think it is a very strong argument for saying that no change should be made in the Order Paper without the suspension of the Standing Orders. I will only say, in conclusion, that, from what I gleaned from the arguments on both sides of the House, and my own study of the matter in all such cases as the one under consideration, when any change is made in the order of the business on the Order Paper one thing is absolutely necessary in order to effect that change—that is, consent. That is the very essence of the question. That matter of consent is required in every instance that the honorable member for Waikato has adduced. He has not been able to adduce a single instance in which a change was made against the wishes of a minority; therefore this matter of consent is essentially a part of the question.

Mr. ROLLESTON.—I would like to call attention to one case. It has been said by the last speaker that consent is necessary in all cases of change in the order of business. Now, I have a case before me in which the Orders of the day were postponed, which I would like to submit to you, Sir. On the 12th October last year, "Mr. Rees moved, and the question was proposed, That Orders of the day Nos. 13 to 19 inclusive, and Nos. 36 to 39 inclusive, be postponed, in order to proceed with Nos. 6, 9, 40, and 20 to 35 inclusive. And the question being put, the House divided, and the names were taken down as follows:—Ayes, 37; noes, 16. So it was resolved in the affirmative." From the experience I have had of precedents in this House I think they are decidedly in the direction of this motion of the honorable member for Egmont being taken. I think the strongest point of all is that of Standing Order No. 70, which says, "Unless the House shall otherwise direct, Orders of the day for Tuesdays and Fridays are to be disposed of before the House will proceed upon any motions of which notice shall have been given." That seems to me to decide the whole question.

Mr. JOYCE.—Sir, before you decide, I should like to make one remark from an entirely non-professional point of view. If it should be ruled that it is competent for the honorable member for Egmont to move his motion, it will do away with an error under which I have laboured up to the present time. I have always understood that it was an act of courtesy on the part of the Government to give way on a notice of motion of want of confidence. I was always under the impression that it was a concession on the part of the Government to cease the transaction of other business in order to give the Opposition an opportunity for the discussion of their motion. If this motion can be submitted, I shall no longer labour under that error, because it will be very clear that there is no concession whatever in granting this privilege, inasmuch as it would be quite competent within twenty-four hours for the Opposition to take by force what has hitherto always been considered to be an act of courtesy. I desired to say this because, if your ruling is in favour of the motion being put, one error at all events will be cleared away from my mind.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have been under great anxiety in regard to this question, and I must ask the House to extend to me a just and large consideration. I may observe that it is a very different question to have to interpret rules, and to interpret a practice according to the different spirit with which such interpretations are received. The ruling is not scanned and criticised in the same manner when there is an amount of agreement as upon an occasion when there is a considerable amount of temper in the House, and when "the pound of flesh" and that only is insisted on. I understand that that is precisely the position just now, and therefore it is an occasion on which I am justified in asking for the consideration of the House in deciding this difficult question, the difficulty of which I have endeavoured to meet to the best of my ability. I have referred to the several cases quoted of ordinary instances on which notices of motion and Orders of the day have been altered from the position in which they stood on the corrected Order Paper. In my opinion, the instances quoted by the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) do not apply to the present case, because there was more or less of consent in the instances referred to. There was, indeed, a precedent quoted by the honorable member for Rangitikei (Mr. Ballance) which was very much more to the point, and which very much impressed my mind. It is the case in which Mr. Gladstone, in 1868, after he had obtained an adverse vote against the Government, being disappointed in a supposed arrangement by which a certain motion was to come on, gave notice that he would, on a certain day, move the suspension of Standing Orders with a view to the postponement of certain Orders of the day, in order to bring on a motion which he deemed of importance. Before I go further, let me deduce one conclusion from that case: If that proceeding could be taken and the motion could be made at all, that fact entirely disposes, in my mind, of all the objections made by the honorable member for Riverton and by the honorable member for Auckland City East, in which they pointed out that excessive Parliamentary inconvenience would arise from such a practice. I say that, if the practice has undoubtedly obtained which was pointed out in the case quoted by the honorable member for Rangitikei, then the whole question of inconvenience is disposed of; although, like many other privileges of Houses of Parliament, this particular privilege may be abused. The significant point in that case is the suspension of the Standing Orders. It will be observed that notice was given that it was the intention to alter the order of business, and, at the same time, notice was given that a motion would be made to suspend the Standing Orders in order that the motion for alteration of the order of business might be proceeded with. In regard to this point, I am very much influenced by the Standing Order of this House referred to by the honorable member for Avon just now, and previously by the honorable member for Waikato—namely, Standing Order 70: “Unless the House shall otherwise direct, Orders of the day for Tuesdays and Fridays are to be disposed of before the House will proceed upon any motions of which notice shall be given.” Now, unless I am to infer that the words, “unless the House shall otherwise direct,” are mere surplussage, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that the House has retained to itself, by the express insertion of these words, the power to make any alteration in the order of business, if it were thought fit, without proceeding to the necessity of suspending any Standing Order, because, if it were necessary to suspend the Standing Order, clearly these words would have no meaning, but would be entirely surplussage. At the same time, I am bound to point out that I have referred to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and, notwithstanding that the same words are there inserted in the Standing Order referring to the same subject, still Mr. Gladstone, on the occasion referred to, in 1868, did think proper to give notice that he would move that the Standing Orders should be suspended. Have we any other precedent of our own? I am bound to say that, generally, the practice, so far as my experience goes, has been loose in this respect in this House: still, we have a precedent, and I cannot altogether overlook it. It was referred to by the honorable member for Egmont this morning. The case occurred in 1873, and I have read the debate upon it. A motion was made by Sir Donald McLean in 1875 that the first Order of the day be postponed in order to proceed to a discussion on a motion to introduce a Bill. A discussion ensued, in which I myself, as has been pointed out, with others, took part, and we strenuously opposed that motion; and I observe that on that occasion I dwelt upon the question of surprise. The motion, however, was carried, and, although there was no division, there was just as much opposition as if there had been a division. I cannot, therefore, agree to the statement in which it was sought to be contended that in no case has there been any hostility, but that it has always been a question of concession. Then, as to the general argument which I understand is maintained that on Government days the Ministry have such absolute control over the business that no one can, except by their concession and their leave, alter the order of proceedings, and that the Ministry themselves must be the proposers of any such motion, I do not so read the privilege given by the Standing Orders and by the practice of Parliament to Ministers in respect of the days which are called Government days. I understand that on those days Ministers have the privilege of arranging the business in the order in which they think fit to put it on the Paper. They might, no doubt, move the postponement of the Orders of the day after having regulated them on the corrected Order Paper, but they could not do so if objection were made, except by calling on the Orders one by one and so disposing of each on its merits. I come then to the general principle laid down in May, to which reference was made yesterday when I ruled upon the point submitted to me by the honorable member for Egmont; and I have been more impressed since on further reference to it, for not only do I find that notice is of essence, but that it applies not only to the prescribed order of the Orders of the day, but also to notices of motion, showing by the repetition of the words in each case that they did not accidentally occur but were of essence to such alteration. I will briefly read two passages which occur at pages 255 and 257 of the 1873 edition of May:—

It is, therefore, clearly contemplated that that can be done upon notice being given, so far as relates to the postponement of the Orders of the day. Then, in the next page but one there is a rule laid down with regard to notices of motion:—

“When it is desired to resume an adjourned debate, or to give precedence to any other Order of the day, on a notice day, it is usual to induce members, who have notices on the Paper, voluntarily to postpone them; but when they decline to forego their privilege, or it is deemed right to interpose the authority of the House, notice having previously been given, an order is made that the notices of motions be postponed until after the particular Order of the day which it is desired to consider, or that such Order of the day have precedence of notices.”

So that, both with regard to the alteration of notices of motion and the alteration of the order of taking the Orders of the day, notice has previously to be given; and nothing occurs in either of these passages which would lead me to infer that it is necessary that the Standing Orders should be suspended for that purpose, but only that in all cases notice must be given. There is another point raised by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout), in which he pointed out that it will be impossible to get at this notice of motion—that, until after the Orders of the day have been dealt with, it could not be arrived at. That would be a fatal objection supposing this were what, for this purpose, might be described as an absolute and independent motion. I consider, however, that it is what may properly be termed a contingent or dependent motion. If it had been an absolute and specific motion for Friday, the 9th of November, it could not have been called on; but it is a motion contingent upon the first Order of the day being called on. When, therefore, that event occurs, then is the period when the motion is ripe for being called on. I hope I have made myself clear in that respect. With regard to the whole question, it will be gathered that I consider this motion can be made, and is not out of order. Here, however, I am met with a great difficulty. The exact terms of this motion are, "upon the first Order of the day being called on." We will suppose that event to have arrived, and the first Order of the day to have been called on: that first Order of the day is "Land Bill—to be further considered in Committee." Now, when any Order of the day is called on by which any Bill has been ordered to be further considered in Committee, the rule is as clear as possible that the Speaker leaves the chair without question being put. Absolutely, I do not see how it is possible that this question can be put, on account of that obstacle. If it had been an ordinary question in regard to which the rule did not peremptorily require that I should leave the chair without question being put, I am clearly of opinion, for the reasons I have adduced, that, so long as notice had been given and therefore there was no surprise, it would be competent for any member to challenge the order of business, even on Government days, as prescribed by the Government, just as much as it would be for the Government themselves to make any motion in that respect. I do not, however, see how this motion, worded as it is, can possibly be put. If there had been any other Order of the day excepting one subject to such conditions as those attached to the first Order of the day to-day, I should decide that the motion of the honorable member for Egmont could be put, and should feel confident that my ruling was consonant with the spirit of the usage and practice of Parliament. There is just this question I should bring under the notice of the House: When I was about to call on the first Order of the day, I remembered, and my attention was also drawn to it, that it was alleged that the practice of my predecessor in office had been to permit the interval before calling on the Orders of the day, when the time had arrived for them to be called on, to be taken advantage of to make any motion. I informed the House to-day that I really could not see the reason of that, and I am still in the same state of mind; but, this being a case in which I am bound to deliver the "pound of flesh," I am constrained to rule that this contingent motion cannot be put, because when the first Order of the day is called on—that the Land Bill be further considered in Committee—I am bound to leave the chair without any question being put.

LAND BILL.

This Bill was further considered in Committee. Clause 73.—Application of proceeds of land sold. Subsection 3: "The surplus, after deducting twenty-five per centum as damages for breach of license, to the selector."

Mr. MURRAY proposed the insertion of the ## RAILWAY RESERVES.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL wished to ask a question without notice. From the ordinary sources of information honorable members had learnt that the Executive Government had, in the Province of Otago, made a large reserve of waste lands for the purpose, apparently, of constructing a railway at Tapanui, and the Waste Lands Board of that district had marked off the reserve. It appeared to him that it was probably through inadvertence on the part of the Government that so large a reserve had been made without affording any information to the Council; and he thought also that probably his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary would think it right that the opinion of the Council should be asked on reservations of that kind. Since that time he noticed, from the ordinary sources of information and from the Order Paper of the other House, that other large reserves were being contemplated to be made. The question he wished to ask the Government was, Did the Government consider it was sufficient for the purpose of making large reserves for railway purposes that a resolution should be passed in the House of Representatives without the information or knowledge of the other branch of the Legislature? He also wished to know if the honorable and gallant gentleman would be kind enough to tell the Council under what authority of law these reserves had been or were contemplated to be made. It appeared to him that the only reserving power of a general character which at present existed in regard to railways was that afforded to the Executive Government by section 20 of the Public Works Act of last year. That Act repealed a number of Acts previously in force, and provided generally for matters relating to railways and public works; and the 20th section of that Act said, "The Governor may, by Proclamation, from time to time reserve such parts of the waste lands of the Crown as he thinks fit for railways, roads, bridges, ferries, or for any other public works constructed under the authority of this Act." Were the reserves which had been made, and which were contemplated to be made, upon resolution of the other branch of the Legislature, made under the authority of this section, or, if not under this section, then under what authority of law?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMOKE replied that no such reserve had been made on a simple resolution of the other House. A resolution of either branch of the Legislature was an indication of the wish of that branch of the Legislature, and the Government would give their best attention to such resolutions, and would carry them out when they appeared to be practicable and lawful. Therefore, though a resolution had been passed in another branch of the Legislature to reserve certain lands, it by no means followed that the Government would make any such reserve whatever. However, he did not seek to evade the question by that answer, and would state that the Government were of opinion that in certain cases it was in their power to make temporary reserves until they were legalized by Act. There were many cases in which that course had been followed. The honorable gentleman would at once admit that such reserves for railways made under the Public Works Act of last year were legal. He was also aware that for many other purposes mentioned in the 12th clause of "The Waste Lands Act, 1858," the Governor had that power; and, according to Waste Lands Acts in the various provinces, differing in each, the Governor had power to make reserves under various limitations. He was given to understand that a reservation of 500,000 acres had been thus made on the West Coast, and he was also given to understand that, according to "The Otago Waste Lands Act, 1872," reserves could be made of a specific character on the recommendation to the Superintendent of the Provincial Council. Therefore it by no means followed that, even if the actual power to make reserves did not exist in some parts of the colony, it did not exist in other parts. At all events, the Government would not act illegally in what it did. Furthermore, it did not follow that, although it might be legal, the Government would think it wise. They had by no means made up their minds as to the course they would take in regard to this particular railway when the question of making a permanent reserve came up. What was recommended was only a provisional reserve, until a certain survey was made.

BLUFF HARBOUR BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the Council would remember that during last session a Bill passed through both branches of the Legislature under the same title as this. The objects of that Bill were threefold. It proposed to establish a Harbour Board at the Bluff; to give that Board an endowment of pastoral land in a central district; and also to give certain borrowing powers to the Board. On the occasion of the second reading of that Bill, it became clear that the Council would not grant the borrowing powers, but it was hoped that the endowments would be given. Unfortunately, although the Bill with the endowment clauses passed its second reading, yet, by a chance vote at the eleventh hour, those clauses were struck out. He thought it was rather done by accident than anything else, or with the intention of adhering to the same plan of action in regard to other Harbour Bills which came suddenly in great numbers before the Council towards the close of the session. If all the Harbour Board Bills had been dealt with in the same manner as this one, he would have had no occasion to consider that the Bluff had not been dealt with fairly; but that was not the case. In many cases endowments and borrowing powers were given. The object of the Bill now before the Council was to give the power which was then refused to this Board, and he thought the Council would have such a sense of justice, and of the propriety of taking this action, as would induce it to concur in the proposal he was about to make. The Council would remember that he pointed out the special reasons why the Harbour Board should not only be constituted, but why it should also have funds placed at its disposal to enable it to carry out the improvements that were indispensable in order to give the necessary accommodation for the shipping, which from year to year had been practically increasing. When the Bill was under consideration last year he expressed his views in detail regarding it. The object of the present Bill was to set aside a reserve of 36,000 acres of land, some sixty or seventy miles in the interior, and to give the Board the power to borrow £50,000. He stated last year, when the Bill was first brought under the consideration of the Council, that both the Provincial Government and the General Government had objected to have any agricultural land included in the endowment. The endowment last session was exclusively pastoral land.

Hon. Colonel Whitmore

The tract proposed to be given now was almost the same pastoral land which it was proposed last year to give as an endowment. He had already pointed out that the trade of the place was fast increasing, and at the present time he would only say that, on taking the average for the last five years, the port had stood fifth in respect of the shipping both inwards and outwards. With respect to the imports it had stood seventh, and in regard to the exports it had stood sixth, of all the ports in the colony. As far as the Customs duties were concerned, it had for three years out of five been ninth, and in two of those years it had been eighth. The increase of the trade might be gathered from the largely-increased exports. He found that in 1866 the export of wool was £79,000 in round numbers, while in 1867 it was £105,209. In 1871 it was £127,000, and in 1874 it was £235,294. The export of grain rose from the value of £40 in 1867 to £3,877 in 1871, and £3,887 in 1874. The construction of railways had given an immense stimulus to agriculture. The returns of wheat and oats were above the average of any other district either in the South or in the North, with one single exception. There was one district in the South where the returns had been larger. Besides the increased stimulus to production, and the great increase to the export trade, the import trade would augment enormously on the completion of the railway line to Dunedin. There could be no doubt that, the Bluff being the first port of call from Australia and the last on the departure from New Zealand, many classes of goods of light weight and high value would be landed there and sent northwards, especially seeing that there were only two links now wanting to complete the chain of railway communication between the Bluff and the northern corners of Canterbury. Having recently conversed with the captain of one of the largest steamers trading on the coast, one who had large experience of such matters, he had asked that gentleman to give him his opinion as to the character of the Bluff Harbour, and the probability of the trade increasing within a few years; and Captain Underwood, of the "Arawata"—

ADJOURNMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—Since the honorable member began his speech, I have heard that the other branch of the Legislature has adjourned until half-past seven o'clock this evening, as a mark of their regard for a gentleman who for many years was a member of the General Assembly. I think, under all the circumstances, it would be a token of respect if the Council were to adopt the same course.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—I am aware that the Government were asked to propose the adjournment of the House until this evening, and, as all sides of the House were so disposed, they consented to do so. I intended to move to the effect that the Council should adjourn; but I wished to get through as much work as possible before doing so. However, as I understand the funeral is just starting, I think the Council should now adjourn.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I will resume the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

COUNCIL RESUMED.

BLUFF HARBOUR BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said that when the Council adjourned he was pointing out that, as the railway extended northward for about ninety miles, although the line was not yet completed, and eastward for about seventy miles, where it was not yet connected with the line from Dunedin, the country gradually came into occupation, and the produce was very largely increased. He referred to the large increase in the export of wool, grain, and other products of very considerable magnitude. In the year 1875-76 something like six and a half million feet of timber were exported. There were, likewise, other industries which had already increased and would in the future still more swell the exports—such, for instance, as preserved meats. A very large quantity of preserved meats had been exported from the Bluff. Except during the last autumn, the works had been suspended for two or three years past, seeing that the prices of fat cattle did not admit of preserved meat being sent Home with a profit. Besides this, a paper manufactory had been prospering very well, and a considerable quantity of paper had been produced. Limestone was abundant, and he had no doubt that lime would become an important article of export. Building stone of the very best quality was found close by the northern line of railway. In fact, at the present moment a quantity of stone was being brought down, for building purposes, and for kerbing the streets of Invercargill, from a quarry alongside the railway. The peculiar position of the Bluff, the facilities for conveying produce to it and exports from it, and its favourable position as regarded Australia, must all render it a port of the first importance, much higher than it stood at present, although it ranked fifth in New Zealand. He was about to observe, when the adjournment took place, that, in response to a request, Captain Underwood, a good authority as a nautical man, who had traded for many years between Australia and New Zealand in command of steamers, had written to him in the following terms:—

“Having traded to Bluff Harbour in various steamers for a number of years, and watched the rapidly-developing commerce of the port, the increase in number and size of ships loading and discharging there each year, and continually experiencing delay and inconvenience from the scanty wharf accommodation, which for years has been quite inadequate to the requirements of the port, necessitating ships lying two deep and working their cargoes over each other's decks, it becomes very necessary that further jetty extension should be made without delay to meet the requirements of the rapidly-increasing trade of the port.

“Bluff Harbour, being a good safe port, easy of access to the largest ships, and from its geographical position having greater advantages than any other port in New Zealand, through its proximity to Australia and Tasmania, the first port to ships from the westward, and from its railway connection with the north and its natural advantages, is destined soon to become the Plymouth of the colony, being capable, by improvement, of affording the best and safest accommodation for vessels of the largest class.

“Having perused with much interest the able and thoroughly practical report by Mr. W. Brunton, C.E., on Bluff Harbour, its natural advantages and proposed improvements, which, if carried out, cannot fail to make the Bluff one of the many excellent ports of which New Zealand may justly feel proud, . . .”

What was wanted in this case was not, as in many other cases, an endowment to make a harbour, but an endowment to provide that accommodation which the rapidly-increasing trade of the port required in a harbour which Nature had already made.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE had only to say that he had perfect confidence in that body which would have the examination of this Bill, and he hoped honorable gentlemen would read it a second time, in order that it might be remitted to the Waste Lands Committee, where sufficient information would be taken on the subject; and they would be in a position to give an intelligent opinion when they received the report of that Committee. All that the honorable gentleman had told them was very interesting in itself, and would receive great attention in Committee. It was quite possible, however, that, while everything the honorable gentleman had stated might be fact, still, without prejudice to the opinion of those who advocated this measure, it might not be considered desirable to make a large reservation of public lands to endow this harbour. The Council refused it last year upon good grounds, and it was quite possible it might take the same course again. He quite indorsed all the honorable gentleman said about the harbour itself. He had seen it, and knew it to be a very valuable harbour to New Zealand; and if the Committee, after examining the circumstances, should recommend that it be done, he should be very glad to see some steps taken towards improving it.

PATEA HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was introduced into the House of Representatives by the Hon. Major Atkinson, who had requested him to take charge of it in the Council. Honorable gentlemen would remember that last year there was an Act passed called the Patea Harbour Board Act, which provided for the administration of the harbour and also supplied a modest endowment of land—in all, a little more than 3,000 acres—for the use of the port. The object of the present Bill was to correct an error in the appropriation of the land which was made for the harbour, to make an alteration in the constitution of the Board, and to provide for granting an additional endowment of some 200 or 300 acres forming the foreshore of the Patea River and of the beach at the approaches to it. In the schedule to the Act of last year there was included a section numbered 568, containing 300 acres of land. After the Act was passed, and when proceedings were instituted for the transfer of this land, it was discovered that that particular piece of land had already been granted, and was private property. It was proposed by this Bill to release that land—to amend the schedule by leaving out that block and substituting other blocks of land containing exactly the same quantity—namely, 300 acres. It appeared, also, that two other blocks of land, numbered 320 and 565 in the schedule of the Act of last year, were erroneously described as to their boundaries and as to the quantity contained in them. It was proposed by this Bill to make that correction, and to define anew these two blocks that were proposed to be set apart last year. The Patea Harbour Board, as constituted by the Act of last year, consisted of two persons appointed by the Governor, the Mayor of the Town of Patea, the Chairman of the County Council, and two persons elected by the governing body, which was interpreted to be the Patea Borough Council or the Highway Board, whichever was in existence at the time. The alteration proposed to be made by the Bill was that one person should be appointed by the Governor, two persons elected by the governing body, one person by the County Council of Patea, and one person elected by the ratepayers of each of the ridings in the County of Patea. The former members were elected for two years, and the time for the election was fixed for the second Monday in January. The 3rd clause of this Bill proposed that the members should be elected for one year only, and that the time of the election should be the second Monday in the month of February. After the large endowments proposed to be given in the Bill, the principle of which the Council had just affirmed by allowing it to be read a second time, he was almost ashamed, on behalf of such an important district as Patea, to be obliged to ask for such a very small quantity of land as was contained in the schedule to this Bill—namely, not more than 200 or 300 acres. The lands proposed to be granted were portions of the foreshore of the river and of the beach at the entrance to the harbour, which might be reclaimed by the works the Board would be authorized to carry on. He thought there could be no objection to the Bill being read a second time.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said there were some objections on the part of the inhabitants to the proposed composition of the Board. The county was hardly satisfied to have a voice in the election only of two members. It must be borne in mind that the Town of Patea was very small indeed, while the district was a very large one, and it seemed to be looked upon as rather a hardship that two persons should be elected by the governing body, which was defined by the Act of last year as being the Town Board of Carlyle, or, in the event of Carlyle being constituted a borough, the Mayor and Council of the borough.

Hon. Dr. Pollen

The Borough of Carlyle was an exceedingly small affair, and it would practically have an equal voice with the whole of the large district embraced in the County of Patea. In Committee he should endeavour to restore the balance in this respect by an amendment; but that was the only objection he would make to the Bill, for, if it were possible to make a harbour, or to improve the harbour, at Patea, so as to admit of any shipping for so small a sacrifice of the public estate as they were here called upon to make, he would be very glad to see it done. He only hoped that it was feasible and possible, but, from his own recollection, it did not look a very easy matter. However, it would be an unmixt blessing to the whole of that coast if they could get a place which would afford accommodation for vessels drawing even six or seven feet of water.

Bill read a second time.

RIVERTON HARBOUR BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he did not wish to go over the same ground as he had traversed in connection with the Bluff Harbour Bill, and he would very shortly recapitulate the leading points. There was at present a very useful harbour at Riverton for vessels of 150 tons and under, but there was a lack of proper jetty accommodation, which had especially been felt during the last two years since a bridge had been erected across a narrow part of the estuary over which it was intended to take the Orepuki Railway. The bridge extended from near the point from whence the old jetty started, and the jetty had become rickety and useless, and, by way of giving accommodation to the shipping, a projection over the bridge had been constructed running down the stream, and at right angles with the bridge, which made it very inconvenient for vessels entering the harbour. It was hoped that better accommodation might be easily obtained by running a jetty along the side of the channel, and that larger vessels might be admitted by extending a sea-wall along one side of the mouth of the estuary. The harbour was a bar harbour. The channel was winding; and consequently, with a strong south-east wind, there was some little difficulty in entering if there happened to be a heavy swell on. But, by running a sea-wall for some little distance across the channel straight out, it was expected by an engineer who was consulted on the subject that the scour would keep a deeper and direct channel always open, and so admit the entrance of larger vessels. The country of which Riverton was the outlet was very rich agricultural country. There was a considerable extent of it, and the land was very fertile. He found, on reference to the shipping returns, that, in 1875, 95 vessels entered Riverton, and 100 cleared, the total tonnage being 17,500 tons; and, in 1876, 95 entered and 98 cleared. The Customs revenue from 1870 to 1876 averaged £5,477. A very large quantity of grain was exported from Riverton. The main object now desired was to run a sea-wall out in order to straighten the channel, and thereby produce a scour which would deepen it so as to admit larger vessels, and, what was of still more immediate importance, to provide proper wharfrage accommodation for the vessels that now visited the harbour. With that object, it was proposed by this Bill that the Harbour Board should receive an endowment of 15,000 acres of pastoral land, and be authorized to borrow not more than £20,000 upon the security of this land and the wharfrage rates and dues. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that honorable gentlemen in considering this Bill would doubtless give some thought to the circumstances of the part of the country to which it referred. For his part, he waited to be assured that it was the outlet of a large trade, and afforded convenience to a considerable number of settlers. He hoped the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill would satisfy his mind on that subject. What he did know about this matter, and what he had ascertained during the last few days, was that the colony had already given three railways to Riverton. There was one railway which united it with the Otago system; there was one that ran inland; and there was the third into the bush country—all converging upon the Port of Riverton. Already, without the least difficulty, vessels up to 100 tons could enter the harbour, and vessels of that tonnage were by no means very small vessels. He had read the scheme by which it was proposed to improve this harbour, and he read that, after certain operations had been carried out, there was a possibility of a greater depth of from 2 ft. to 2 ft. 6 in. being obtained. But it was pointed out that if that operation did take place the waves were likely to be so much higher as to diminish a great deal the advantage to be gained from the extra depth. The district which was proposed to be benefited by this allocation of public land was a district that they were told was an exceedingly rich one. He would like to have been assured that they would be likely to increase the growth of grain by giving it a Harbour Board; and to have been told that the enormous railway facilities already given at the expense of the colony to this small place did not sufficiently provide for the carrying away of the grain. He was quite aware that, unless the charges for carriage were moderate, grain-growing could not be carried on with profit. He had hoped that the honorable gentleman would have told them that by giving a direct sea traffic a very much larger area of grain country would have been brought under cultivation. These considerations had been impressed on his mind since he had first been made aware that such a Bill was to be brought into the Council; but, knowing that Bills of this kind must pass through the customary ordeal, and being quite unacquainted with the kind of statistics he wished to obtain to influence his mind on the subject, he would be content to await the report of the Committee before he offered the Bill any opposition. If the Waste Lands Committee reported favourably upon the Bill, he apprehended that, inasmuch as they had passed the Wanganui Harbour Bill the other day, they could not very well refuse their assent to this measure. The Wanganui Harbour Bill, honorable members would recollect, affected 15,000 persons, who occupied a large district that was likely to be made more productive by the existence of a harbour. There were points on which he would like to have information, because this year there was evidently not the same disposition to refuse endowments as there was last year. Still, if they came to cases in which they were manifestly throwing away endowments—manifestly giving endowments to a place not having a full claim—he would, just as he did last year, oppose them.

The Hon. Mr. NURSE could relieve the honorable gentleman's mind on one or two points he had mentioned. The honorable gentleman had spoken as any person might do who had not lived in the neighbourhood, and had taken a great many things for granted. For instance, he said there were three railways converging on Riverton. He could assure the honorable gentleman that there were no railways there at all. They existed on paper, and were very nearly paid for, but they were not there in reality, nor were they likely to be there for a considerable time. One of them led westward to Orepuki. He believed that there was no intention to go on with that line at present, and there was considerable opposition to the railway leading into the interior—to the Otatau. That leading to Invercargill was the only one being proceeded with, and that would not relieve the grain traffic of Riverton. The principal production of that part of the country was oats, and the principal market was not in the colony; consequently the grain had to be carried principally in small vessels from Riverton to Melbourne. A few years ago there was a considerable trade, but this of late had fallen off owing to the Victorian tariff. The profit on oats left a very small margin, and, unless the port was improved, the growth of grain would be impeded. He did not think it was likely to increase very much on account of the railways, from the fact that the margin of profit was so small that it could not bear the carriage. The district was not likely to be brought into much more cultivation, because nearly the whole of it was now under cultivation in grain or grass. He would like to see alterations made in the Bill in Committee, in order to prevent the money to be borrowed from being thrown away; and, indeed, the Council ought to have some plan or scheme before them, as in the case of the Bluff Harbour. That the harbour was capable of improvement, and that it was the outlet of a very large agricultural district, were facts that honorable members could ascertain for themselves by reference to the report of Mr. Carruthers in 1875.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said, remembering the pronounced opinions on the same question which the Hon. Colonel Whitmore held last year, when on the opposite side of the House, he was not without sympathy for the honorable gentleman as regarded the difficulty in which he now found himself. He was not unwilling that the Waste Lands Committee should give the help which the honorable gentleman expected to receive from it in extricating him from the dilemma in which he necessarily was; but he would like the Council to instruct the Waste Lands Committee definitely as to what was really referred to them, or what they were expected to do on this occasion with respect to this Bill and to others of a cognate character. As he understood the meaning of the Standing Order, it was that, wherever a Bill dealt with waste lands and a description of the land was given in the schedule, the function of the Waste Lands Committee, technically, was to see that the description of the land proposed to be given was correct, and that, in other respects, the Bill in its details was accurate. He did not know at all that it was proposed to impose upon the Waste Lands Committee the duty of pronouncing upon the policy of making large endowments of the public estate for such works as were proposed to be carried on by this Bill. That, he thought, was the duty of the Council itself, and its opinion upon the subject of policy was supposed to be declared when it allowed a Bill to be read a second time. He had no doubt that, if the Waste Lands Committee were instructed to consider and report upon the policy of this and other appropriations of the public estate which were proposed to be made, they would not shrink from the discharge of that duty; but, without a positive and direct instruction, it would seem to be almost an impertinence for the Waste Lands Committee, its functions being limited and defined in the way he had pointed out, to raise the question of the policy of making large appropriations of the public estate for such works as these. The whole situation, to his mind, was becoming very alarming. The Council was asked a short time ago to dispose of 35,000 acres for the use of the Bluff Harbour. Honorable members were now asked to dispose of 15,000 acres for the use of Riverton, and would be asked presently to dispose of 400,000 acres of the public estate for some other purpose. He wanted to know whether or not the Committee was to formulate an opinion for the Council on the policy of such immense alienations of the public estate, or whether the Council had not the courage of its opinions upon that question, and was afraid to express a sentiment which was very general in the Council as to the impropriety, under the present circumstances of the colony, of making such a disposition of the public estate. He would very much rather have heard from his honorable and gallant friend a more pronounced view of the purpose and wishes of the Government he represented with respect to these endowments. He would greatly prefer that the honorable gentleman should have led the Council to express its opinion at once and without fear on the policy of these proposals, rather than that he should shelter himself, as he proposed to do, behind the Waste Lands Committee, in the hope that that Committee, without instructions, might undertake a duty which did not belong to it. To the Council it belonged to express its sentiments upon the policy of this measure.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL thought that the remarks that had fallen from the Hon. Dr. Pollen deserved the attention of the Council. It was curious that honorable members should be left in this matter without an expression of opinion on the part of the Government as to the propriety of the proposals contained in the present measure and others which had been before the Council. His honorable and gallant friend would surely allow that there was a vast difference between a proposal to build harbour works at the Bluff—one of the finest harbours in the colony—upon a plan which had received the most careful examination, and which included the reclamation of land that would be of considerable value at the terminus of the railway system of the southern part of the Middle Island, and a proposal for the expenditure of money upon a harbour at Riverton, which expenditure must, even if the plan were successful, have a prejudicial effect upon the revenue of the railway which would connect Riverton with the Bluff. They were being overwhelmed with proposals which appeared to him to be purely of a speculative character, without any evidence of system or of a well-considered plan. When the Hon. Mr. Hall brought forward a proposal to endow the Wanganui Harbour and to make further provision for the port there, the honorable gentleman laid before the Council very full information as to the necessity of the endowment as well as the means for carrying on the work. Thereupon the Hon. Dr. Pollen proposed to make an additional endowment for the Patea Harbour, which would have the effect of reducing the harbour dues and the value of the Wanganui Harbour. In this country, in fact, no sooner was it decided to do some public work in some centre where there was no doubt of its value, than immediately proposals of a similar sort sprang up from another district adjoining, based on the sole proposition that, if district A got money to be spent, district B should have some too. That was exactly the position of the Riverton Harbour in relation to the Bluff Harbour. The Hon. the Colonial Secretary now said to the Council, "Let us send these Bills to the Waste Lands Committee, and when the Waste Lands Committee goes through them I will tell you what the Government thinks of them." Would the honorable gentleman give the Waste Lands Committee the benefit of his presence and advice; and would he promise that, when the Committee reported, he would announce the opinion of the Government, so as to guide the Council? He (Sir F. Dillon Bell) might be allowed to suggest that it was hardly fair to send these Bills to a Committee consisting of members who were promoting one or other of these Bills. For instance, his honorable friend Mr. Menzies promoted the Bluff and Riverton Harbour Bills; he himself was the promoter of the New Plymouth Harbour Bill; his honorable friend Dr. Pollen was the promoter of the Patea Harbour Bill.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN had not that honor. He was merely acting as agent.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL could not understand an honorable gentleman who had held the position of Colonial Secretary getting up and saying that he repudiated the promotion of a Bill which he had just asked the Council to agree to, and that he only acted as "agent." Then, again, another member of the Waste Lands Committee promoted the Wanganui Harbour

Bill. It was hardly fair for the honorable and gallant gentleman to say to the promoters of these Bills, "You are all on the Waste Lands Committee, and when your report comes back I shall make up my mind." He hoped the honorable gentleman would excuse him for saying that the Council did not want to know what his opinion as a private member was, except for the valuable assistance he gave to the Council, and the ability he always brought to bear upon the examination of any subject. While that honorable gentleman sat on those benches, what the Council wanted to know was the opinion of the Government. The importance of this question was growing every day. He would not now go into the bearing these proposals had on our financial position, but would content himself with asking one question. They knew from the Financial Statement that the land revenue within the last few years had been charged with as much as it could possibly bear. They were now asked to lay aside a very large area of Crown lands in reserves, which must very largely affect the saleable amount of land, and therefore the receipt of land revenue. Now, if all these reserves were made, how did the honorable and gallant gentleman propose that the land revenue should be kept up, and the engagements of the country met?

The Hon. Captain FRASER said the Council must not forget that if it passed the second reading it accepted the principle of the Bill. He was not himself prepared to do that. He was perfectly satisfied that this endowment was not required. The honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill talked of a sea-wall to increase the scour and deepen the bar. Now, there was an honorable gentleman in the Council who had lived twenty years in the district, and who assured him that the bar had never been deeper or shallower than at present, which was a certain proof that there was a reef across it. So it would be useless to attempt to deepen it; and the money spent upon a sea-wall, which was proposed to be built at very great expense, would be actually thrown away. All that was required at Riverton was a small jetty which would allow two or three small craft to lie alongside, and which could be put up for £1,000. Therefore he could not accept the principle of the Bill, and would vote against the second reading. The Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell had shown the rather curious position in which the Council were placed in referring Harbour Bills to a Committee of Harbour Bill promoters. He thought the good sense of the Council was quite sufficient to settle the matter now, and he would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY listened with some little disappointment to the remarks of the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell. He thought, from the tenor of those remarks, that the honorable gentleman entirely agreed with his own view, and would have taken the course taken by the Hon. Captain Fraser. What could be the use of the honorable gentleman declaiming against making those large endowments, if he and other members of the Council did not take some action in the matter? He was surprised to hear the honorable gentleman place the whole burden on the shoulders of the Colonial Secretary. What that honorable gentleman had to do with it any more than the late Colonial Secretary (the Hon. Dr. Pollen) had to do with it, he could not see. The honorable gentleman seemed to forget that these Bills were not a crop of this year. They were a crop of last year, and were merely resuscitated. They simply formed a part of eighteen or twenty Harbour Bills which came down last year, and which were not received in the favourable manner they now were. He would not like to say anything offensive to the Council, but he supposed he might say this: that he, at any rate, was acting consistently. It was with very great reluctance that he rose to speak; but he felt constrained to do so, because he could not act inconsistently, however much other honorable gentlemen might feel they could with propriety do so. He could consistently point to what he said last year when the Bluff Harbour Bill was under consideration. He then declared his intention to oppose all borrowing powers—which then pervaded all the Bills—and also all endowments. He had consistently acted upon that principle, and he would continue to act upon the same principle. Some honorable gentlemen, who had started last session with the same view as he did, at another stage in the consideration of those Bills withdrew their objections to endowments, but still maintained their objections to borrowing clauses. Now, he still maintained the same objection to both, because the endowments so proposed to be made were nothing more than granting money in lieu of borrowing powers. Unless they heard from the late Government, who first brought in those Bills, or from the present Government, who now permitted them to be brought in, some clear definition and some uniform plan upon which those endowments were to be made, he did not think they ought to be granted. If the Government stated some definite plan, they might be presumed to be following some principle, but, if the present mode were continued, he would say that it was absolutely dishonest. The only actual asset for the money they had borrowed was the Land Fund and the lands of the colony. It was all very well to say that they had borrowed upon the Customs, the Consolidated Fund, and all that sort of thing. Those were uncertainties; but the actual asset was the land of the colony. It was never contemplated, at the time the money was borrowed, that those large endowments would be made, and that they would be prepared to extend, as they did last year, and were doing now, borrowing powers to corporate bodies, Harbour Boards, and other bodies of that kind. He did not think it a duty to repeat oneself from session to session. He took his stand when Sir Julius Vogel's policy was first introduced, and he was perfectly satisfied with the course he took, and he believed he would be one of those who, in the end, would be found to be right. He believed the colony was now plunged into difficulties—to which attention would shortly be drawn by honorable members of the Council—owing to the course taken on that occasion. He had also opposed provincial borrowing when it was proposed two or three years ago, and he had taken the same course in more recent times. He would vote for the amendment, and he saw no reason, and believed he would see no reason hereafter, when honorable gentleman had expressed themselves on the financial condition of the colony, to change the course he had taken, and he would continue to give the same opposition as he had done hitherto in the direction of which he had spoken.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN hoped the Council would allow him to say a word in explanation to his honorable and gallant friend Colonel Kenny. He did not think the honorable gentleman desired to do him, or the Government of which he was a member last year, an injustice; and he would call to the honorable member's recollection that, of all the Bills of the kind of which the honorable gentleman complained that were introduced last year, none of them were promoted by the Government as such. The only Bill he had any personal concern with was a little Bill to promote the improvement of the Waimakariri Harbour, and he was bound to say that it received at the hands of the Council worse treatment than any of the other Bills similar in character that were introduced. He thought it right to call this fact to the recollection of his honorable friend, and to add that, in regard to that particular Bill, he was only representing a colleague who had a deep interest in the welfare of the district in question.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY understood the honorable gentleman to rise seriously, and not to make a joke. He, at any rate, said in all earnestness that he did not intend to cast any reflection upon the late Ministry, or upon the Hon. Dr. Pollen. He simply meant to imply that it was rather inconsistent that the honorable gentleman who was then Colonial Secretary should expect the honorable gentleman at present holding that office to justify the course that had now been taken, when it was his own duty equally to justify the course that was taken by the late Government last year.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN was only desirous of expressing the greatest possible sympathy with his honorable friend the Colonial Secretary.

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—“A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind.” His honorable friend Dr. Pollen sympathized with the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, because he did last session what that honorable and gallant gentleman was going to do this session. He could bear his honorable friend Dr. Pollen out in the assertion that he fathered last session one of the Harbour Bills, which appeared to the Council, upon inquiry into the matter, to be a very questionable Bill. He quite agreed with those honorable members who said that upon the second reading the Council should say “Aye” or “No” to the principle of the Bill. What was that principle? It seemed to him that the principle was this: Should they authorize the appropriation of a certain portion of the public estate in the neighbourhood of Riverton, for the purpose of making other land in the neighbourhood of Riverton more easily accessible, and of thereby encouraging its beneficial occupation? That was the principle; and had his honorable friend the introducer of the Bill shown, not an absolutely conclusive case, but had he shown a prima facie case why they should go into Committee to consider this Bill? He was bound to say that he should have liked to have heard more full and definite information on the subject than the Hon. Mr. Menzies had given them—that kind of information which had been supplied in the case of the Bluff Harbour. In that case there was an amount of authentic information placed before them which was satisfactory, and it would have been better if equally detailed and authentic information had been supplied to them in regard to this Bill. On the whole, however, he was not prepared to say that his honorable friend had not made out a prima facie case for the Bill being further considered. While he thought the Waste Lands Committee should not have imposed upon it the task of deciding the general principle of whether they should apply the waste lands to the improvement of harbours which furnished an outlet for those waste lands, as he considered the Bill when it went to the Waste Lands Committee had their indorsement upon it to that effect, yet he held the Committee was bound to go into the question of whether it was likely that the improvements which would be effected by means of the Bill would have the object which his honorable friend said they would have. That was not a question which, with all due respect to the Council, he submitted, they could fairly go into in the whole Council: and therefore, if they thought that there was a prima facie case made out with regard to a harbour which was the outlet for an important part of the country; if gentlemen from that part of the country testified that it was a rich producing district, and that the produce raised there would not bear heavy carriage expenses, as they knew oats could not, and there were consequently difficulties in its finding its way to the market—if all these things happened, he thought there was a prima facie case for a detailed consideration of the matter in Committee. On that ground, therefore, he would be prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill. Before sitting down he would say one or two words in reference to what had fallen from the Hon. Colonel Kenny, and also, in some degree, from the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell. His honorable and gallant friend said he was perfectly consistent in the action he had taken, and he (Mr. Hall) could bear testimony to that. The honorable gentleman had opposed these Harbour Bills throughout. But where he thought the honorable member was not accurate was in saying that granting these endowments was tantamount to authorizing borrowing. It was just the opposite—it was rather in the place of borrowing. They authorized the appropriation of a certain portion of the waste lands of the Crown for the improvement of means of communication, instead of compelling those persons who were locally interested to borrow money for the purpose—instead of compelling them to burden themselves with debt. It was not tantamount to borrowing, but in lieu of it. It was a different mode of executing the work, and, he ventured to think, a very much better mode. He very much regretted that this principle of carrying out public works had not been carried very much further—had not been initiated long ago. If that had been done, they would not have found themselves at the present time staggering under a very heavy load of debt on account of the public works which had been undertaken. His honorable friend would, he was sure, admit that he (Mr. Hall) was equally consistent in advocating the principle of the appropriation of public lands to these large public works. He believed sincerely that for any new country that was the very best policy which could be adopted. Of course it required to be carried out with care and with prudence, but, if that were done, he believed there was no policy more likely to conduce to the prosperity of a new country than that of taking care that its waste lands, as they were parted with, were made use of for encouraging the beneficial occupation of the land. The Hon. Colonel Kenny said that the waste lands were the only asset they had, and therefore it was a duty they owed to the creditor not to part with them in this way. But what were they doing? Were they preserving this asset? What did the public accounts tell them? They were selling it as fast as they could; and was it any greater injustice to the public creditor to apply a portion of the waste lands of the Crown to improving the remainder, than to sell the public estate outright to private individuals, and have no further claim upon it? Was there any wrong done to the public creditor in the one case which was not done in the other? If he were a public creditor of the colony he would very much rather see half of its public lands applied to improving communication all over the colony, and therefore to improving what was left of the public lands, than see them sold outright to private individuals, without any guarantee that those improved means of communication would be effected. He hoped his honorable friend would consider that view of the case. His honorable friend Dr. Pollen had said that the Council should not be afraid to express its opinion on this question. He quite agreed with the honorable gentleman, and therefore ventured to lay down pretty broadly what he believed to be the right policy in these cases. He had very great sympathy with any proposal of this kind; but, at the same time, it was quite right that they should guard against proposals such as those described by the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, for the mere purpose of getting grants of land. But, if they were fairly on their guard against proposals of that kind, and only assented to such as could be shown to be useful and necessary to develop the resources of the country, they could not go too far in so applying the waste lands of this colony.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said his honorable friend Dr. Pollen just now bespattered him with that kind of sympathy which, he confessed, did not make him feel "wondrous kind." The honorable gentleman said what was particularly antipathetic to him—that he was endeavouring to shelter himself under the Waste Lands Committee. If he did endeavour to shelter himself under the Waste Lands Committee, what opinion did the honorable gentleman form of his own action last year, when nineteen of these Bills were sent to that tribunal? He (Colonel Whitmore) did not like to be supposed to shelter himself under any tribunal whatever. Wherever it was his duty to undertake responsibility, come what might, he would loyally accept it. But he did not consider it was the part of the Government to express a Ministerial opinion upon every Bill promoted by a private member which was brought into the Council. The course he had taken in speaking upon this Bill was rather in his private than in his Ministerial character, because there was no Ministerial function particularly with regard to the Bill. He rose in his place, and gave honorable gentlemen all the information he had been able to get with such facilities as he had at his command; and, notwithstanding the partial contradiction of his honorable friend Mr. Nurse, he believed that information to have been entirely accurate, and such as to enable honorable gentlemen to form an intelligent opinion on the subject. But he said before and said still that, unless they rejected this Bill upon the principle that they would not tolerate endowments in land and borrowing powers in connection with the waste lands, it was their duty to send it and similar Bills to some tribunal where the plans could be inspected and evidence taken, and where an opinion could be formed and reported to the Council as to whether the project was feasible or not; whether it was one that would seem to be desirable and for the good of the country, or whether the proposal appeared to be a frivolous one, based upon no fair grounds whatever. That was the position he took up both on the present occasion and last year. The Hon. Colonel Kenny said very truly that he had always taken a consistent stonewall course with regard to these matters. He (Colonel Whitmore) refused to do that last year on the second reading of the first Harbour Board Bills. He said that there was one general objection which, in his opinion, pervaded all these Bills, and that was that this was a matter in which the Government should introduce a general Harbour Board Bill, and place a proposal before the House to guide honorable members—that they should tell the Council which, in the opinion of the Government, were national harbours and which were not. As that proposal was not made, he thought they could, in almost every case, resist the Bills that were brought before them, unless in the Waste Lands Committee it was shown that the public interests would suffer if some steps were not taken. It was stated, for instance, in the Waste Lands Committee, with regard to the Oamaru Bill, that, unless something were done immediately, the large sums of money which had been expended upon that harbour would be lost—that the works would be destroyed by the action of the sea. He thought that was a good ground for making an exception, and accordingly he made that exception to the others last year. Something of the same kind was proved in regard to the Wanganui Harbour, but the Council refused to allow anything more than a very limited foreshore endowment. In that case a definite and reasonable project was put forward, and the Council was shown how the public interests would suffer if something were not done at once, and it limited its action to the very lowest requirement. This year the Council had affirmed the principle of the Wanganui Bill. They had acted, in his opinion, in a totally different spirit from that in which they had acted last year. It was not for the Government to control this branch of the Legislature. It was represented here by only one Minister, and it was impossible that the Government could, in measures of this kind, attempt to use in the Council the force and the influence that it could use in another branch of the Legislature. Therefore it followed that, when the Council had once taken into its own hands a measure involving a principle of this kind, he must take as his guide in judging the temper of the Council what its action was on that occasion. He told honorable gentlemen how, in his opinion, this Riverton Harbour Board Bill stood, and he gave a very fair indication as to how he would, as an individual member of the Council, have voted. He would have allowed the Bill to go to the Waste Lands Committee, to examine its proposals, as was done with the measures last year; and if a good case could not be shown he would vote against the Bill. Therefore the Hon. Dr. Pollen, notwithstanding his sympathy, was a little unfair upon him. The honorable gentleman felt no obligation upon himself last year to defend each one of the Harbour Bills, or to make a Government statement upon each; but what he did feel that he was entitled to do was to introduce the most ludicrous Bill and the most preposterous proposal of all those made to the Council. In doing that, the only indication he gave to the Council of the mind of the Government with regard to the Harbour Bills was his attempt to throw a sort of ridicule over the whole. With the exception of the Castlepoint Harbour Bill, which, they were given to understand, was introduced for no other purpose than ridicule, there was no Bill brought before them that had so little to commend it as the Bill the Hon. Dr. Pollen introduced; and the honorable gentleman was content on that occasion to allow the Bill to go to the Waste Lands Committee, without imagining or allowing it to be thought that he was sheltering himself in any way. It was very true that the Vogel policy had brought about these questions, but not because the principle of endowments of land was any part of that policy. It was struck out very early in the Vogelian era.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—It was his.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said it was Mr. Vogel's originally, but it was never carried out. It was struck out exceedingly early in the Vogelian era. These measures were brought about by a demoralization of the public mind. There was a desire, a craving, for spending money upon any kind of enterprise, without the slightest reflection as to whether it was to be remunerative and good for the State or not. That was what the Vogelian policy had done for the country. It had flushed them with too much borrowed money, and they had hardly yet begun to understand what a heavy burden they would feel it when they had to pay the price. That payment was not very far off. His honorable friend Sir F. Dillon Bell had very often this session alluded to it, and had hinted at it on the present occasion. The fact was, their financial position was not a satisfactory one. He did not intend to shelter himself—he said it in his capacity as representing the Government—when he said that their financial position was most unsatisfactory, and would demand, at no distant period, large sacrifices from the people of this country merely to pay the interest on what they owed. He did not think that he did anything unreasonable in agreeing, as a private member, that this Bill should be read a second time, for in doing so he was following strictly the precedent of last year. They would affirm the principle only, subject to what the Committee found out for them, and what they could ascertain in Committee of the Council, to be satisfactory. If it were not satisfactory, they would go no further with this or any other similar Bill. The Government had no desire that any proposal which was unsound or unsafe in itself should be pressed through the Council; and, in suggesting that this Bill should go to the Waste Lands Committee, he did not desire to impose upon that Committee, over which he believed his honorable friend Dr. Pollen now presided, any unusual or unfair task. He did not think that any additional instruction would require to be given to the Committee beyond what was customary. He hoped honorable gentlemen would not think he had taken up too much of their time in the remarks he had made. The fact was, he rather felt the animadversion that had been cast upon him by two or three speakers, notably the Hon. Dr. Pollen and the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, because, in a Chamber in which there was but one representative of the Government, and where so many Bills had to be introduced by him, it seemed to him to be impossible to take a Ministerial view and make a statement upon every single Bill that came into the Council. He took up a great many Bills to prevent their being allowed to lapse, and informed himself upon them as well as he could, for which he could only be responsible in his private capacity. He would always inform the Council when the Bill was a Ministerial one, but there were a great many Bills with regard to which he felt perfectly free, and as to which the Government were not at all bound to make a Ministerial statement. Last year he took so distinct a part in connection with Harbour Bills that he felt bound to act consistently this year, and it was on that account that, as a private member and not as a Minister, he had pursued the course he had taken in regard to this Riverton Bill. He hoped he would not be accused of evading any part of the responsibility that ought to fall upon a Minister on the one hand, and, on the other hand, that he would not be debarred from expressing his opinion as a private member of the Council in regard to any Bill of this nature. His honorable friend Sir F. Dillon Bell cast a distinct reflection upon him when he said that he had no business to speak in his individual capacity in this matter. He (Colonel Whitmore) desired to assert for himself a right to speak on such matters in his private capacity, and not to be always supposed to be enunciating a Ministerial statement in every word he said.

The Hon. Mr. HART said there was one subject which had been brought up in this debate to which he thought it worth while to call the attention of the Council. It appeared to him, from all that had been said, that the action taken by the Waste Lands Committee upon this class of Bills was one which did not strictly belong to it. Although valuable service had been rendered to the Council by that Committee, and although there had been no other provision made for meeting the necessity which had been met by the Waste Lands Committee taking upon itself a very onerous duty, still, properly speaking, Bills of this class should be referred to a Sessional Committee appointed expressly at the commencement of the session—a joint Committee of both Houses, to whom these local Bills should be referred. They should be introduced under certain regulations, as was the case with all Bills of this kind introduced into the Imperial Parliament. A Bill of this description would never be brought into the Imperial Parliament without some notice having been previously given to the public, and without certain necessary and preliminary proceedings it would not be taken into consideration by the House. Now, he thought that there should be a Sessional Committee to whom Bills like these should be referred, and to whom parties promoting these Bills should be bound to furnish plans, estimates, and grounds for their proceeding, with reasons to induce the Legislature to pass the Bills. What did the Council know about these matters beyond the general statement made by the member who moved the second reading of the Bill? There was another point which had been mooted in this debate, and as to which he thought the view taken by the Colonial Secretary was hardly correct. The question of how to find outlets for the produce of this country, of how it should reach the ocean, of how the commerce of the country should be carried on, was one which the Government should specially take into its consideration; and a thorough and judicious discrimination should be exercised by the Government over these very Bills themselves; and the Government, by its representative in the Council or elsewhere, should be ready to say that it is either prepared or not prepared to support a Bill of this kind. The Government should take upon itself that responsibility, because these were matters which affected the commerce of the country. There should be one general system steadily studied out by the Government, so as to discriminate with judgment the merits of each. He did not think that this case was one on which sufficient had been stated on the second reading to induce him to support the measure, and he would therefore vote for the amendment.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN was sorry he could not support the Bill, principally for the reason that he did not see any necessity for a harbour in such close proximity to that for which they had just passed the second reading of a Bill. He looked at the map of Southland, and noticed that—he would not say within cannon-shot, but—within a very short distance of Riverton was the Bluff Harbour. He was at Invercargill two years ago, and he was then informed that the Riverton Harbour was about fifteen or twenty miles from Invercargill. If such were the case—if Riverton were even within fifty miles of the Bluff—he scarcely saw the necessity for harbours dotted along the coast so very near each other. He totally objected to the principle of endowing harbours all over the country by the appropriation of land, except in special cases. In the case of the Bluff Harbour it might be a national benefit, but in the case of a small harbour like the Riverton one he did not see the justice or necessity of it. If it was necessary to do anything to the harbour, let the people put their hands in their own pockets in the same way as the people of Auckland had done for their harbour. As far as he could learn, something like a small wharf or pier was all that was required. If such were the case, surely it would not be a very large burden on the rate-payers of the district to tax themselves for that purpose. If he understood the Hon. Colonel Whitmore aright, he argued that, because the Wanganui Harbour Bill had passed, it was only right that the Riverton Harbour Bill should be assented to. He did not think that they were parallel cases, because they knew that on the West Coast of the North Island, from Wellington up to that celebrated harbour called Raglan, there was not a harbour of refuge. He therefore thought the Wanganui Harbour was a work of necessity; otherwise he totally disagreed with the land being devoted to such a purpose. The District of Wanganui was a young district, and, unless aided by the Government in some way or other, they could not possibly make the harbour themselves. He would vote for the amendment.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said that this Bill had led to an interesting debate, and it was to be hoped that something good would come out of it. However, it would be very unfortunate if Riverton lost the Bill through it. He would vote for the second reading, because he thought that as good a case had been made out for it as for others. He was glad to hear the remarks of the Hon. Dr. Pollen and the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, although he thought it was scarcely fair to the honorable gentleman representing the Government to ask him to state the views of the Government. He looked upon those endowments as an evil which had been growing up for years past. It arose through the Government not taking up the question as they should have done, and leaving it to private members. It was very wrong that private members should be allowed to introduce Bills dealing with the public estate, and he was sure that such a practice did not prevail in other colonies. That was one mistake. The next was with respect to the works themselves. He thought the Council were often asked to deal with those matters without having any information whatever before them as to whether the works proposed were likely to be of any benefit, or likely to be equal to so much money thrown into the sea. No doubt a great deal could be said in favour of land endowments for such works; but honorable members would agree that during the last two years they had become very lavish in those endowments: in fact, outsiders might be impressed with the belief that they wanted to get rid of their public estate as soon as possible. There was one thing which, in his opinion, was lost sight of. If they looked into the accounts of those provinces in which reserves were made, they would find that the land revenue year after year did not actually pay the charges upon it. In fact, year after year they were covering the deficiency in the Land Fund of those particular provinces with Treasury bills; and yet they were making away with the land as fast as they could. That was a very strange way of dealing with the public estate. The Hon. Mr. Hall spoke very much in favour of making land endowments, and he understood him to say at the same time that the endowments were made in lieu of borrowing. He was very much surprised to hear that remark, because it appeared to him that it was very rarely they had given endowments without also giving borrowing powers.

The Hon. Mr. HALL might be allowed to explain. He intended to say that the alternative was either for the colony to borrow money to make harbours, or to grant land for that purpose. In the one case they would augment the colonial debt, while in the other they would only diminish the colonial estate.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY did not altogether see the difference, and, if they flattered themselves that in giving those bodies power to borrow they were not adding to the debt of the colony, they were making a mistake which they would soon find out. He thought it would be far better for the Government to borrow money for this purpose, if necessary. As he said before, the Government had neglected the interests of the harbours of the colony. He had always held that the harbour works should not be left to Boards. Besides, if large borrowing powers were given, they would have to pay a high rate of interest. A short time ago the borrowing powers were limited to 6 per cent. Now the rate of interest was 7 per cent. If the works were done by the General Government they would be able to get the money at 5 per cent. Thus 2 per cent. per annum was lost to the people of the colony. In the case of the Wanganui Harbour Board Bill, he found that the sum authorized to be borrowed was £100,000, and the endowment 25,000 acres. There was the Bluff Harbour: borrowing powers £50,000; endowment, 35,634 acres. There is the Patea Harbour, where there are no borrowing powers, but last year there was an endowment granted of 3,500 acres, and this year there is a further endowment of 286 acres. Then there was the Riverton Harbour Bill: the borrowing powers were £20,000, and the amount of endowments 15,000 acres. There was also the New Plymouth Harbour Bill, in which the borrowing powers were £200,000, and the endowment one-fourth of the proceeds of the whole land revenue of the province. There was thus proposed to be borrowed a total of £370,000, and 75,000 acres of land proposed to be given as endowments. As other similar Bills had been read a second time, he thought this Bill should also pass, and go through the ordeal of the Waste Lands Committee. It was a pity that so many members of the Waste Lands Committee were promoters of Harbour Bills. However, he had faith in them, and he hoped that each would look into the Bills closely.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK thought it was a pity those Bills did not go to the Waste Lands Committee before they were read a second time. He did not go the whole length of the Hon. Colonel Kenny, who denounced borrowing altogether, even for useful purposes. If it were for a remunerative purpose he would not object to borrowing, but he thought this was a case in which they should not grant either endowment or borrowing. In the first place, they had no plan before them, and anything he had heard certainly did not induce him to believe that it would be worth while to spend this money. The honorable member said that, in each of the years 1875 and 1876, eighty or ninety vessels took away 17,500 tons of cargo. But he also said that if the harbour were improved they would not be able to send away any more, because the district at the present time was cultivated to its full producing power. Now, they had gone to enormous expense in making railways, and it appeared that several were to converge in Riverton. He did not think they should spend a large sum of money in making harbours which would be competitors with those railways. He would support the amendment.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL wished to make an explanation with reference to the remarks of the Hon. Colonel Kenny. The honorable gentleman expressed not only surprise at the course he had taken, but apparently great disappointment, as if he (Sir F. Dillon Bell) had led him to expect that he agreed with the view that all those Bills should be stonewalled. That was not his view. What he said was that there should be a uniform plan for dealing with such Bills; and, while he had no doubt about the necessity for certain harbour works properly considered, he did not see that there was any reason why, because they voted in favour of the second reading of the Bluff Harbour Bill, they should necessarily take the same course in the case of the Riverton Harbour Bill. He also wished to point out to the Colonial Secretary that he was mistaken in supposing that it was his (Sir F. Dillon Bell's) intention to make any reflection upon him. But the doctrine which the honorable gentleman announced, that a Minister was entitled, upon a question of this kind, to express his individual opinion, apart from the opinion of his Government, was most surprising. A Minister had no freedom of expressing an individual opinion upon a question affecting the public estate. It had been laid down by Parliament that no harbour works should be undertaken without the sanction of the Governor in Council, and he would respectfully submit that it was not right for the Government to give support to any Harbour Bill, or to allow any Harbour Bill to go through the Legislature, without having some view of its own as to the nature, necessity, cost, and value of the proposed harbour works. That was why he thought the honorable gentleman could not hold the position that he did. Unless good proof were shown of the necessity and value of this work before the Waste Lands Committee, he would not be a party to recommending its adoption. In the case of the Kakanui Harbour Bill, he had declined to introduce it, because Kakanui bore the same relation to Oamaru Harbour that Riverton bore to the Bluff. He thought the policy was an absurd one of first expending large sums on one harbour, and then setting up a rival harbour in close proximity to it.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER wished to say a few words in order to complete the lecture which he thought the Hon the Colonial Secretary had properly received. He thought that the doctrine that honorable gentleman enunciated was very extraordinary. It was impossible for an honorable member occupying his position to dissociate himself from his responsibility as a member of the Government leading the Council. He could not speak merely as an individual upon measures such as this one, affecting the public interests. He was free to confess that he expected that the honorable and gallant gentleman would have guided him in this matter. He thought that it was the duty of the Government in matters of this kind to afford the information which they had a better opportunity of obtaining than private members had. He regretted that this Bill could not be sent to a Select Committee: not because he had not perfect confidence in the Waste Lands Committee, but because that Committee had so much to do that he thought that the work would be better done by a Select Committee. If a good case could be made out for the Bill by the Committee he would certainly be inclined to vote for it, because he considered that the principle on which these endowments were given was that the works would enhance the value of the public estate; and therefore, so far from adding to the burdens of the country, they would be relieving the country. This port certainly seemed rather near to the Bluff Harbour, but, at the same time, on the understanding that he was free to act hereafter as he saw fit, he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that there was one point which rendered the claim of Riverton rather weak—namely, that a large sum was to be spent on the Bluff Harbour, which was in close proximity, and which was really a harbour capable of improvement, and the only one they could afford to improve in the present state of the finances of the colony. No one could wish better to Riverton than himself. He was not going to follow those honorable gentlemen who tried to find out where the blame lay for bringing these proposals forward. He was of the opinion of the old philosopher who said that when people got into trouble fools blamed others, men beginning to be wise began to blame themselves, and wise men blamed no one. He thought it was a waste of time trying to discover who was to blame for their present condition. Two or three of them stood out against those financial proposals which had brought the colony into that condition, out of which it required greater ability to extricate them than it required to involve them in. Those who stood out against those schemes might satisfy their own vanity by recalling their past action; but they did not succeed in protecting the country, and he did not think there was much use in recalling what was past. With regard to the question of consistency, he thought that every member who came there determined to vote justly and rightly in every matter that came before him was deserving of as much praise as the member who prided himself upon voting the same way each successive session. But he held one opinion very strongly: that was that, involved as they were with the public creditor, it was the duty of the Government in power to protect the interests of that creditor; and it was clearly the duty of the Government to see that the security should not be reduced by any carelessness or inattention. So far from that being the case, it was very much the practice of Governments to follow the example of a gentleman well known in history, who was probably respected by leading statesmen, and who, when he found he was in difficulties and likely to leave his place, told those to whom he was under certain obligations to take pens and write quickly; and so sacrificed the interests committed to his charge. It was all very well for the Hon. Mr. Hall to say they did not sanction borrowing, and that this did not affect the public creditor. Well, it affected the public creditor to this extent: that, so far as they went on appropriating the public estate as endowments, they were reducing the security to that amount; and, to his mind, taking the plain common-sense view of the matter, they were very much in the position of the merchant in difficulties who, finding himself totally insolvent, made over to his wife or some intimate friends as much property as he possibly could. That seemed to him to be the analogue in private life of the course they were pursuing now. Honorable gentlemen expressed regret that this mode of endowment was not discovered until lately. It was not discovered because it was thought that the public creditor would not be so ready to advance money for large works if the colony had not all this land to offer as security. It was only now, when they had nearly exhausted their power of borrowing, that they wanted to secure those little nest-eggs for themselves. After the money had been expended in those places to the full extent of their just claims upon the colonial purse, they wanted to make over what security remained, in order to spend it upon some other little work of their own. He quite agreed with the suggestion that it would be better that instructions should be given to the Waste Lands Committee to extend the sphere of its action in regard to Bills of this kind. As a matter of form, he would vote in favour of the amendment against the Bill, although, as a matter of certainty, he supposed it would go, with other Bills of the same kind, to the Waste Lands Committee.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES altogether differed from the opinion expressed by the last speaker, that they were lessening the value of their security by applying a certain portion of their capital, of their landed estate, to certain public works. It was quite true they were lessening the extent of that landed property, but it was equally true that if they applied it properly to useful public works, such as the improvement of natural outlets, and improving the facilities for communication by railways, they were increasing the value of the estate they retained to a greater extent than they lessened it by diminishing the area. Therefore the argument would not hold that they were squandering their capital. It might be that they were not applying it in every case so well as they ought, and in such cases they were no doubt lessening the value; but, where the capital was properly applied towards increasing the facilities for access to ports, and adding to the facilities of internal communication, then they raised the value of what remained, and increased their assets. It had been stated, and very justly, that matters such as this should be initiated by the Government—that the Government should fairly consider which were the best ports and those which deserved to have the largest expenditure on them. With the strong engineering staff at their command the Government were in a position now to do what hitherto, perhaps, they had not been capable of doing. He did not, however, go the length of saying that those were the only ports on which any expenditure should be made. The very case now under consideration was one on which, possibly, the Government, at a distance, might say, "There is the Bluff Harbour—a harbour of the first class—situated within a reasonable distance, and within a few hours' sail. What do you want with another port?" He answered that it was quite true that a railway had been designed; that contracts had been taken for that railway leading from the Invercargill and Winton Railway to Riverton, and from thence to Otatau; that a very large amount of money had been expended, and some of the earthworks had been constructed: yet there were only a few hundred yards of rails laid down, and, as they were only 29 lbs. to the yard, they would require to be taken up before anything more than mere toy carriages and wagons would work upon them. The earthworks had not been completed. There was a small piece formed here, a mile there, and half a mile in another place, at various points between the northern line and Riverton; but there was no great length continuously formed. A sum of money had been paid to the contractor by way of payment for the works, and compensation for the loss of contract, very nearly equal to the whole sum for which he originally contracted to take the work; and the completion would probably cost half as much again as the original contract. He did not think the colony would be in a position to carry out that work for some time. But, supposing that it was constructed, what followed? Certainly not what the Colonial Secretary said, and what other honorable members believed, would follow. Riverton was by this line of railway about twenty-three or twenty-four miles from Invercargill. They counted nineteen miles from the Bluff, and at the very least Riverton must be not less than forty miles from the Bluff. The cost to the farmer of sending oats forty miles by railway to the Bluff would be very considerable compared to the cost if shipped at Riverton; it would absorb the margin of profit. The harbour at Riverton was not one which had to be formed, or one which had been selected in order to start a traffic. There was a traffic there now. It was a good harbour for small vessels. What was wanted was such improvements in the entrance of the harbour and such increased wharf accommodation as would facilitate the traffic and lessen the expenses. The Hon. Mr. Peacock had said that this proposed improvement would not be likely, it was admitted, to increase the produce. He thought the honorable gentleman had entirely misunderstood what fell from the Hon. Mr. Nuree. What he (Mr. Menzies) understood the latter honorable gentleman to say was, that the country had already been roughly cultivated, was partly now in cultivation, and the most part in grass; and that, if a ready and rapid communication with the outer world and increased facilities for export were given, there was no reason why the whole of that country should not be brought again under cultivation. All the grass country there, which was mostly limestone country, was very productive, and he had no doubt that, if the price of grain were the same as it had been in the last few months, the effect would be to bring the whole into cultivation again. The tendency in the South was to run rapidly over the rough land and bring it into cultivation, then to lay it down in grass, and thus place it in the best condition for the subsequent growth of crops. The suggestion of the Hon. Mr. Hart, that these Bills should be referred to a Sessional Committee before being read a second time, was similar to one thrown out the other day by the Hon. Mr. Hall, and which was now being considered by the Standing Orders Committee. He had no doubt the proposal would be carried out, and be found to be very useful. At the same time, the Waste Lands Committee, in considering these Bills, by no means had its hands tied down to the details. It had never yet hesitated to consider the policy of any Bills sent to it, whether it was in the order of reference or not, and he had never yet heard its reports censured on that ground. More than that, he thought that, when questions of policy were involved in Bills brought under its revision, it would fail in its duty if it abstained from a consideration of those questions of policy. There were two or three other points to which he might refer, but he felt that the Council had bestowed a good deal more time on this Bill than perhaps its relative importance warranted. He trusted the Council would not object to read it a second time, and refer it for further consideration to the Waste Lands Committee.

Question put, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be left out, stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

Monday, 12th November, 1877.

First Reading—Adjournment—Tawhiao—Privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Civil List Bill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir G. GREY moved the adjournment of the House till half-past seven o'clock, in order to afford members an opportunity to attend the funeral of the late Mr. A. Ludlam, who was an old member of the House, and a gentleman who had on many occasions rendered great service to the Colony of New Zealand.

Mr. STAFFORD seconded the proposition with very great pleasure. Mr. Ludlam had been a member of the House in several Parliaments. He was one of the earliest New Zealand settlers, and was in every sense a valuable colonist. He would have been prepared to second a motion to adjourn the House till next day, and he would ask the honorable gentleman to accept that suggestion, if the House expressed a general wish in the same direction.

Mr. J. C. BROWN said that, however desirable such a proposal might be, it should not be forgotten that there was a great deal of very important business before the House. He thought the adjournment till half-past seven would sufficiently mark the respect of the House to the memory of Mr. Ludlam.

Sir G. GREY objected to a longer adjournment than half-past seven. They had now reached a very advanced period of the session, and it would be a very great mark of respect to adjourn till half-past seven o'clock. He certainly could not assent to a further adjournment.

Mr. SPEAKER, with the concurrence of the House, vacated the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

TAWHIAO.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Before the Orders of the day are called on, I wish to read a telegram received from Waikato, having reference to the proposed meeting of Sir George Grey with the King. The telegram is from Major Te Wheoro, a chief who is very much respected in the Waikato country, and who occupies a position as right-hand man to the Native King. It is to this effect:—

"Tawhiao's people are collecting large supplies of food for the meeting with Sir George Grey and yourself. Potatoes and flour have arrived from Waikato. Men have gone to Kawhia for fish and eels, and food will be abundant."

PRIVILEGE.*ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The adjourned debate was resumed on the question, "That a message from His Excellency the Governor, with its enclosures, be taken into consideration."

Major ATKINSON.—I move the adjournment of this debate for one week. It appears to me that there is no necessity in this case to proceed further at the present time. The whole argument has been placed before His Excellency the Governor for his consideration as to how far he agrees with the course we have taken. His Excellency's message in reply has been received by this House, through his Ministers; and I think it would be conducive to the good feeling which this House desires to maintain towards His Excellency if the matter were allowed to stand over for a time. Looking at the fact that the whole correspondence is to be referred Home for a decision—not on any matter relating to our privileges, so far as I can see, but for decision as to what appears to me to be a point of constitutional law—looking also at the fact that there is a very great deal of important business before the House, it seems to me that our time will be better employed this evening in considering the Land Bill than in further considering this question, which can have no result. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate for one week from the present time.

Mr. STOUT. — I think the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) has been placed in a false position. The object of moving the adjournment of this debate is apparent to the most superficial observer. The honorable member for Egmont wishes to get on with Motion No. 3 before the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City is discussed. I presume he is afraid that if the motion of that honorable gentleman is acceded to he will be sent for rather than the honorable member for Egmont. The object is so transparent that I think it very bad generalship on the part of the honorable member for Egmont, who should have got some other member of his party to move the adjournment. For my own part, I think it is much to be lamented that, in an important question of this character, there should be any party feeling manifested on either side. It is not a question affecting one party in this House alone, but it seems to me to be a question affecting not only the privileges of this House, but the whole scope of constitutional government. Now, what are we asked to do? Adjourning the debate for a week simply means that there will be no reply sent to His Excellency before the mail leaves via San Francisco—I believe at the end of the week. The result will be that His Excellency will be allowed to send an ex parte statement to the Home authorities as to the position in which Ministers and himself stand towards each other. I had hoped that when this matter was brought before the House we should have found the honorable member for Wellington City doing what he intends to do—namely, discussing this question entirely free from any party bias. I cannot understand what has come over that honorable gentleman. In moving an amendment the other evening he assumed a position totally opposed to that which he assumed a week ago. He has now taken up a position opposed to and irreconcilable with that which he had taken up before. Why he has done that I cannot tell. Nothing has transpired in the meantime. As far as His Excellency is concerned nothing has transpired at all to affect the honorable gentleman's position in regard to the breach of the privileges of this House. Nothing has transpired, except that His Excellency has sent down his own memoranda to this House, and I think any one who will take the trouble to read the memoranda very carefully must regret that His Excellency ever penned them. The honorable member for Egmont says the reason why he moved the adjournment is the sole desire to get on with the business. Well, I presume we are bound to believe what he states. I can only regret that this desire was not manifested last week. It would have been better for the country. We could have had the Land Bill passed through this House if it had not been for his obstructive action. We spent two or three days in doing nothing but attempting to get at this wonderful Motion No. 3. He also made this threat in the House: that, until Motion No. 3 obtained its place on the Order Paper and was discussed, this House would be unable to do any business. Now, I do not at present care to go into the main question, as I presume I shall have an opportunity of doing so at another time. I can only say that I think the honorable member for Wellington City has not been kindly treated. The position of leadership which he assumed has apparently been snatched from him by the proposer of this amendment. I think that he himself must regret that action on the part of the honorable member for Egmont, because he was one of what I may term the Middle Party, and I presume that they ought to be the leaders in a case of this sort. I regret very much that the honorable member for Egmont will not allow the matter to be discussed. I should have liked to have heard the honorable gentleman's reasons. If the House chooses to look at this matter from a party spirit, I have no doubt, when this party fighting comes to an end, and when honorable members get into a harmonious feeling, they will regret that a question of such importance to the whole colony should be treated in the way this question is now treated. The Secretary of State is to define what are the privileges of this House; he is also to define when Ministers act in a constitutional manner. If such be the case, there will be no such thing as Parliamentary government in this colony. It would be far better if we were placed under a dictator at once. I shall say no more, but reserve to myself the right of criticising the matter fully at another time. I shall only say that I am anxious to see the Land Bill gone on with. I think the honorable member who moved the adjournment of the debate should have named an earlier day than this day week for resuming it.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I should feel disposed to agree to the adjournment were it not for the fact that the mail goes to England in a few days, and it takes with it the memoranda of His Excellency the Governor, in one of which, dated the 8th November, he says,—

"This question as to the extent to which Government are responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor is one which cannot possibly be decided in the colony. The Governor has, therefore, decided to forward the whole case for the consideration and decision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, by whose decision he is bound to abide."

It is clear that in this memorandum the Governor submits his view that the Legislature here cannot decide the question to what extent the Government are responsible to Parliament. He also states that he will "forward the whole case for the consideration and decision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies." Now, I was at first under the impression that the Governor was not going to refer the question of the breach of privileges of this House to the Secretary of State for his decision. When I read the words that he was going to forward the whole case to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, it seems as if he was going to include the question of privilege in the question of the constitutional relation of Ministers to Parliament. But, even upon this question of the constitutional relation of Ministers to Parliament, I should be sorry that the House should acquiesce in silence in such a doctrine. That the Secretary of State for the Colonies can decide the question of the constitutional relations of Ministers to this Parliament is a doctrine that I cannot admit. The Secretary of State is the recognized adviser of Her Majesty, and Her Majesty has certain functions, defined by the Constitution Act, with reference to our legislation; but those do not include the definition of the responsibility of the Government, or the determination of the extent to which the Ministry of the day may be responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor. I came down this evening under the impression that the honorable member for Wellington City was going to move his resolution; and I was prepared to move, as an amendment to the second clause, "That this House respectfully, but firmly, protests against any proposal to submit to the decision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies the constitutional relations of the Ministry to Parliament, and the question which has occurred as to the breach of the privileges of this House. The New Zealand Parliament can alone decide those relations, and this House is the sole judge of its own privileges." If the adjournment of the debate would not prejudice the question I should not now rise to oppose it, but if the idea is to go abroad that we are to pass sub silentio the view of His Excellency as to the powers of the Secretary of State with reference to our constitutional government I will not agree to the adjournment. I should have moved the resolution which I have read as a substantive motion if the honorable gentleman had not first given notice of his resolution, when I felt that I was bound to give precedence to him. I say that the view laid down by His Excellency in the extract which I have quoted, and to which I do not think that on reconsideration he will adhere, is perilous to the first principle of constitutional government; and I hope the House will not agree to the adjournment, and at the same time allow any impression to go abroad that it intends to pass by that expression of His Excellency's views without some protest on its part.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I intend to oppose the adjournment. I think the proper way is to settle this question at once. I must say I think the Government acted somewhat injudiciously in recommending His Excellency to make an appointment to the other branch of the Legislature, under all the circumstances. At the same time, that is not the question before us. What we have to consider is the memorandum of His Excellency the Governor and the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers). That honorable gentleman, to my mind, has placed himself in the most ridiculous position that I have ever seen any honorable member occupy since I have had the honor of a seat in this Legislature. He moves now, "That, in the opinion of this House, the course taken by Ministers in relation to the matter in question was unconstitutional and otherwise improper, and deserves the censure of this House." Now, Sir, on the 1st November the honorable gentleman stated,—

"I should be very sorry indeed, and I think it would be very much to be lamented, if this question were treated in any way except as one involving the privileges of the House—one in which all members must be perfectly willing to join in defending those privileges."

Is this defending them?—

Mr. HURSTHOUSE.—Question.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honorable member calls "Question," but I think I know as well as he does when I am speaking to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member should confine himself to the question of adjournment, and merely adduce reasons either for or against the debate being adjourned.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—That, Sir, is just what I was intending to do; but, in order to give my reasons for not consenting to the adjournment of the debate, it will be necessary for me to deal with the whole question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is desirable not to open up the main question.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I do not see how I am to give my reasons for not adjourning the debate without at the same time opening up the main question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will debar himself from speaking to the main question again, if he does so now.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I shall not want to speak to the main question again. The honorable member (Mr. Travers) then went on to say,—

"If the resignation of Ministers was necessitated by a breach of the privileges of the House, I should defend them strongly, whatever feelings I might otherwise have towards them. Therefore I think this question should be discussed absolutely apart from anything in the shape of party or personal feeling. One fact must be borne in mind: We are called on to establish a precedent of a very important character, and I think it would be well for the leaders of the House on both sides to take the matter into consideration, so as to arrive at a settled conclusion. It cannot be satisfactory to discuss the question in anything like heat or animus as regards the occupants of the Treasury benches, or the gentleman who occupies the position of Governor of the colony."

Mr. TRAVERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honorable member has the modest assurance to say "Hear, hear;" and yet, after making those remarks, he ventures to bring forward such a motion as that which he has placed on the Order Paper. Then I find that on the 5th of this month he brought up the report of the Select Committee appointed in the case, and immediately moved a resolution upon which you, Sir, founded your address to His Excellency enclosing the resolution passed by the House. The honorable gentleman again says,—

"I beg to move, That this House concurs in the report of the Select Committee on the Privileges of the House; and that a respectful address be presented by this House to His Excellency the Governor, covering the resolution of this House. As may be seen from the minutes of proceedings, I was not present when the report of the Committee was adopted; but I have no hesitation in saying that, had I been present, I should have voted for the adoption of the report."

Now, what does the report say?—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is travelling beyond legitimate bounds in adducing such reasons against the adjournment of the debate. That is the question before the House, and I hope the honorable member will not travel outside it.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I wanted to refer to the main question, in order to induce honorable members to vote for a resolution which I had intended to move if no one else had done so—namely, the previous question. That is my object; but if you, Sir, rule that I am going beyond bounds in the remarks I am making, I shall of course bow to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question is the adjournment of the debate, and the honorable member should not travel outside that.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Then I shall leave the remainder of my remarks to some other occasion. All I will say now is, that I trust the House will not agree to the adjournment. The mail leaves, I believe, on Monday next, and His Excellency should know the decision of the House before that mail goes out. It is only due to His Excellency that, if any action is to be taken by this House, it should be taken at once; and, if no action is to be taken, then by all means let His Excellency know that as soon as possible.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—I think it will be a great pity to adjourn the debate. It seems to me that the House has somewhat forgotten the position in which the question stands. As far as I understand, we have not arrived at any decision whatever upon the question with regard to these papers and the memoranda between His Excellency and Ministers. All that has been done is this: It has been moved that these papers and memoranda shall be printed and taken into consideration. We have debated that question up to a certain point, but to this moment no order has been made that the papers should be printed and taken into consideration. I think, therefore, the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) is premature, and out of place as a contingent motion. I cannot see how it can come on until the debate in which the honorable member for Riverton had possession of the House at its last sitting has been disposed of. When we have come to a decision one way or the other as to whether these papers shall be printed and considered or not, then will be the time for the honorable and learned member to bring down his motion for the censure of the Ministry for the part they have taken. I can see no utility in adjourning the debate for a week. Let us have this question settled at once. If the Ministry are deserving of censure for what they have done, let us take the matter into consideration at once; and, if the majority of the House deem that they are censurable, then let us censure them and have done with it; but, if not, let us take the papers into consideration, and decide that they are not censurable, and give the answer of the House to the correspondence of His Excellency. We must remember that His Excellency has invited us to give an opinion. He has expressly ordered his Ministers to lay these papers on the table; and the only reason there can be for that order is that he wished the House to give an immediate expression of opinion upon the correspondence and papers attached. Therefore, not only should we be doing wrong to this House with regard to the privileges which we have decided were broken, but we should be disrespectful to His Excellency, if we delayed the answer to the papers which he has asked his Ministers to lay on the table. The honorable member for Egmont has not given one reason why we should adjourn this discussion. It is true he said, "It is very late in the session,—let us go on with the Land Bill;" but, as was very properly remarked, it was only three or four evenings ago that he absolutely threatened a "stone wall." He said, "No business shall be gone on with. You shall not pass a Bill or a resolution. You shall do nothing whatever until my motion is considered." And now he says, "Let us adjourn this trumpery business of privilege—this mere nothing—let us go on with the Land Bill." Sir, that will not do. The House will not fall into that view. Let us have this privilege question settled at once and for all. I believe the honorable member for Wellington City made a mistake in bringing his motion forward, but, having done so, the sooner it is removed from the Order Paper the better. Let us bring that honorable gentleman face to face with the motion which he has taken upon himself the responsibility of placing on the Order Paper, and let us ask this House whether it is going to sacrifice its privileges, and to censure the Ministry because they were not prepared to do so. I believe the course proposed to be pursued by the honorable member for Port Chalmers is the proper course; but I do not think, and I believe your ruling, Sir, will uphold me, that it can be taken. I do not think the previous question can be moved before the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City is made, or before we have come to a decision as to whether the memoranda shall be taken into consideration or not. The debate must be concluded.

The honorable member for Riverton has waived his right to speak for the time, and other members may waive their right to speak. In that case we should come to an immediate decision. We may decide that the memoranda shall be printed and taken into consideration by the House. In that case the honorable member for Wellington City would immediately have a right to move his contingent notice of motion; or we might decide the opposite, in which case the motion would be shelved. I hope the House will observe the immense importance of the considerations involved in this great question raised by His Excellency's memorandum, and will not postpone this debate, or allow any other business to be done until it is disposed of, although the honorable member for Egmont may consider that the Land Bill, under existing circumstances, is of more importance than the privileges of this House. And let us approach the question apart from any party feeling. I am quite prepared to listen to every argument, and to vote in any direction in which my feelings as a member of this House, and not as a member of any party, may lead me. I hope every member will approach the subject in the same manner, and that we shall come to a decision which may be used as a precedent for the future, so that, if such a difficult question arises again, we shall be in a better position to deal with it than we have been to deal with it in this instance.

Mr. BRANDON.—Sir, I think the honorable member who spoke last fell into an error when he said His Excellency wished this matter to be dealt with immediately, because if we look at the memorandum of the Governor we find the following passage:—

"In conclusion, the Governor would wish to state that, in reply to a telegram from himself, he has heard from Sir Hercules Robinson that a precedent, which appears very nearly similar, did occur to Lord Belmore, and that his action was approved of by the Secretary of State.

"The Governor wishes to place no stress upon this information, as he has not been able to find the case, and does not know how far it may be parallel; but it is his intention, if the case has been published, to request Sir Hercules Robinson to furnish him with a copy as soon as possible."

Clearly, therefore, the honorable gentleman did not state the position, because His Excellency refers to a precedent which, inferentially, he says the House ought to consider. As I said before, this is simply a case between the Governor and the Government.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. REES.—The House.

Mr. BRANDON.—The honorable gentleman has his opinion, but I have a right to mine, that it is simply a question between the Governor and the Ministry. If Ministers propose to do something and the Governor says he will not do it, it is for the Government to resign, and then it becomes a question for the House; but that has not been done. His Excellency has simply exercised a discretion which he is intrusted with.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. BRANDON.—I have consulted the constitutional authorities, and I am satisfied that I am right in my opinion that it is a matter the House has nothing to do with. I contend that it would be discourteous to the Governor to deal with this matter now. He complains in his memorandum of having been condemned unheard, of having had no one to defend him; yet now we are asked to consider this matter without giving his Excellency time to quote the precedent to which he has alluded. The proposal of the honorable member for Egmont cannot prejudice the question; therefore I shall support the adjournment.

Mr. W. WOOD.—The honorable gentleman has carefully avoided any allusion to the question before the House, and has not said one word about the adjournment. In all he has said, he has carefully misstated the question at issue. The House is not complaining that the Governor refused to take the advice of his Ministers. The honorable gentleman knows that. What the House complains of is, that the Governor has taken cognizance of what was going forward in this House, and made that a reason why he refused to follow the advice given him by his Ministers. I shall oppose the adjournment for reasons which may be stated in a few words, and which should be sufficient to induce every member of the House to vote against it. A common case of privilege in this House takes precedence of all other business. This is an extraordinary case, seeing that it involves the privileges of this House and of every settler in the country, and therefore it should take precedence of everything. I suppose the honorable member for Egmont has counted noses, and has found that this will not be a stepping-stone to assist him into power, and therefore he is anxious to move it out of his path; but I can tell the honorable gentleman that there are many other stumbling-blocks in his way, and that on the next occasion that he attempts to get on to those benches he will fail, not from one, but from many accidents. I strongly recommend the honorable gentleman to endeavour to come to the conclusion that there are other matters of public business besides that of reseating certain honorable gentlemen on those benches. He talks about letting us get to the business of the country, but the business of the country in his view means that we should again place him on the Government benches. I cannot support the adjournment.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—As a point of order, I should like to know if, the House having ordered this matter to be taken into consideration, we have any alternative from proceeding to the discussion of the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is quite within the province of the House to vary its own order when it pleases.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Before the motion for adjournment is put, I should like to say a few words with reference to what has fallen from some honorable members. For my own part, I am indifferent on the point of adjournment, for the simple reason that I am unable to see how the privileges of this House can be affected by the discussion of the memoranda placed upon the table by Ministers. I may point out that the question, so far as this House is concerned, was settled by the assertion of its privileges and the communication of that assertion by a resolution being forwarded to the Governor. His Excellency does not attempt in the slightest degree, in his memorandum, to deal with this question, either by way of confession or by way of avoidance. He finds himself in an embarrassing position, owing to the relations between himself and his Cabinet. His Excellency puts the matter thus: "Owing to the position in which I am placed by the Cabinet, owing to the attitude that they have taken, and owing to the attitude they at present take in the House, I am not able to give that definite reply which I should otherwise have been able to give." If the Ministry had taken a constitutional course, if they had come down to this House and signified that they had resigned because His Excellency had refused to take their advice by reason of something which was going on in this House, then I should have supported their action at all cost. I was prepared when the matter was first brought before the House, and I am prepared now, to support the Ministry in a constitutional course if the privileges of the House were sought to be invaded. But I look upon the privilege question as entirely apart from the question as to the constitutional relations between the Cabinet and the Governor, and their several relations to this House. The privileges of this House have already been asserted, and I do not gather that His Excellency has any intention of referring that question to the Secretary of State. I read the matter entirely differently. No doubt His Excellency has said he will refer the whole question, but we must look at the context, and I take it that he refers only to the action of the Executive and the position in which he has been placed by them in regard to this House—the circumstance that they will not defend His Excellency in this House while they still choose to retain office. The Premier told us the other night that he at once, in obedience to those instincts which are characteristic not only of a gentleman, but of a gentleman occupying his position, had made up his mind to tender his resignation, but that he was overborne by the advice of the other members of the Cabinet. It is a pity the honorable gentleman did not obey his own instincts. He would then have received the support of every member of this House; he would have received the support, at all events, of those who have any respect for the privileges of this House. I respect the privileges of this House, and I unhesitatingly say that I should have supported the honorable gentleman had he taken the course which constitutionally he ought to have taken in reference to this matter. It appears to me that the adjournment of the House will not in the slightest degree interfere with the privileges of this House, either in the past or in the future, as affected by any action on the part of His Excellency. Its privileges have been fully asserted, and the memorandum of His Excellency simply says that it is his intention to refer the whole question between himself and his Cabinet to the Secretary of State. I should like to know to what extent that decision will affect the privileges of this House. None in the least. But His Excellency has a right to refer his own position and conduct, and the course he has taken in regard to the matter, to the Secretary of State, who is his recognized superior.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—May I ask you, Sir, whether the honorable gentleman is speaking to the question of adjournment?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable gentleman is travelling beyond the question.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I do not wish to travel beyond the question. I am giving reasons why I think there should be no objection to the adjournment of the debate; because the adjournment of the debate does not in the slightest degree affect the question of privilege, which has already been decided. I think, when honorable members are permitted to cast reflections upon my conduct in reference to this matter, and to read quotations from my speeches, the indulgence of the House should be accorded to me while I endeavour to show that there has been no inconsistency in my endeavour to maintain the privileges of this House, and in my reflections upon the conduct of Ministers in regard to the position which they have taken up with respect to his Excellency. The two positions are entirely distinct. I never wavered in the slightest degree in regard to the opinion I have expressed in this House. It is all very well for gentlemen who really do not go profoundly into these questions to attempt to give a colour to language which it does not properly bear. My language bore upon a particular point, and if honorable gentlemen confuse and confound it I cannot help it. It must be attributed to their idiosyncracies. If I thought the adjournment would in any degree militate against the assertion of the privileges of this House, or if I thought his Excellency had referred that question to the decision of the Secretary of State, I should go into the lobby with the "Noes." But that has nothing to do with it. This House has in a most distinct and emphatic manner asserted its privileges—it has always asserted its privileges; but such a motion as mine, whether carried or not, is not likely to affect the position of the Government in the slightest degree. They would not have resigned if it had been carried, nor should I have been called upon by his Excellency to form a Government. They would have accepted the contemplated censure, as they have accepted other censures, with perfect equanimity. But I can see no reason why the motion should not be postponed. The Government will survive the postponement, and it will give honorable gentlemen an opportunity of considering the difference between the question of constitutional law as it now stands between his Excellency and his Ministers, and the question affecting the privileges of the House.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—One very often hears, on both sides of the House, a declaration of this kind: "This, Sir, is not a party question, and we hope the House will not make it a party question." It would be refreshing to believe that this is really the case; but I have lost all faith in protestations of that sort. When we find a quiet, stolid old gentleman like the honorable and learned member for the Wellington Country District framing most absurd reasons for the adjournment, we know very well that it is not the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City that exercises his mind. The fact is, the honorable member for Egmont, smarting under a sense of great anxiety, saw at once that there would be no escape from a political Siberia if the honorable member for Wellington City had an opportunity of bringing forward his motion. It is quite evident that this is being made a party question; but the party will not respond. They have been tried. The whips have been brought into requisition, but the party will not make any forward movement. I have heard of people being extinguished, but it is a strange sight to see a man extinguish himself. That is just what the honorable member for Wellington City has done. Now, let us look at this Gospel according to St. Peter, if I may use the term. The honorable gentleman, two or three days ago, took up this subject in the most earnest manner possible. He was the champion of our privileges. He distinctly laid it down that it was not a question between the Governor and his Ministers—it was a question between the Governor and this House. On that understanding the matter was discussed before the Committee; and, although the honorable gentleman was not present when the report was adopted, he moved its adoption in the House on a statement which absolutely confirmed it. Yet he talks about the instincts which should characterize a gentleman, and says that if the Government had had the instincts which should characterize gentlemen they would have resigned when their advice was refused.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I did not say that.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman said that if the Government had had the characteristics of gentlemen they would have resigned.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I did not say so.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—I am not at all surprised that the honorable gentleman should in five minutes forget what he said.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I said that the Premier, in obedience to the instincts, not only of a gentleman, but of a gentleman occupying his position, said that it was his intention to resign, but that he was dissuaded from doing so by the other members of the Cabinet.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The honorable gentleman has put his foot into it. The Premier, who had the instincts of a gentleman, was prepared to resign, but his colleagues—

Mr. TRAVERS.—I did not say what their instincts were.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—No, but I can tell the honorable gentleman what they are. They are instincts which will at least bear favourable comparison with his. The honorable gentleman says that the adjournment can do no harm, and that neither good nor harm can come out of the reference of the question to the Secretary of State. Sir, the honorable gentleman has been accustomed, in the course of a long professional life, to make the worse appear the better cause, and I was therefore not in the least surprised to hear him use such arguments as he has used on the floor of this House to-night. If we refer this question to the Secretary of State, if he is to settle the question of the privileges of this House, why not refer the whole question to him at once? If we adjourn for a week, we are allowing him to lay down what our privileges are. That is the real question. The honorable gentleman may cover it up in a cloud of words, but that is the real question which still remains. It is not a question between the Governor and the Secretary of State. It is a question of our conduct and the conduct of this House, and the House is ten times more concerned in it than we are. Argument of that kind would not deceive fools, much less men of ordinary intellect. Then the honorable gentleman was guilty of a weakness when he quoted his speeches. He ought never to read them. There is as great a difference between the honorable gentlemen's speeches as could well be imagined. Take up Hansard for the last three months, and it will be found that his speeches will bear out every opinion that has been uttered on any side of any question. As a matter of course, he frequently contradicts himself. But then the honorable gentleman says he never wavers, which is a rather "tall" statement, coming from that quarter, if I understand wavering to mean floating about from one opinion to another, saying one thing to-day and another to-morrow, with the chance of saying something else the next day. I think the honorable gentleman has wavered most unmistakably. He is the political will-o'-the-wisp. You never know where to have him; he cannot be caught. I confess we did try to drop a little salt on his tail, but he changed position too rapidly for us. Sir, the whole secret of the matter is this: There is in this House now what has been termed a baby—an infant phenomenon—and it has been hawked about the House so much that the perambulator of that infant politician has broken down. My honorable friend's motion, which was to turn out the Ministry, and which was to enable him to soar into position as a member of a new Cabinet, has to make way for the child. Well, I can assure the honorable gentleman that the motion for adjournment will not do that. Even at the risk of being accused of cruelty to children it is quite possible that the child will want that political milk upon which it has been nourished. The honorable member for Wellington City says Ministers should have resigned when the question between them and His Excellency was brought forward. That is, to my mind, the real substance of the question between the Ministry and the Governor. I contend we are not bound to resign.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—He said that you should not resign.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—Yes; but that was a few days ago. Sufficient time has elapsed to admit of a complete revolution in the honorable gentleman's opinions. But within the last half-hour he said that we ought to resign. I say that we ought not to do anything of the kind. If we did, it would sanction this practice. His Excellency might not like his own Ministers. He might prefer the old leaven; he might be sighing for a return to the flesh-pots of the political Egypt; and he could very easily decline to accept the advice of his Ministers. I may say that, although some of us are young, we have cut our wisdom-teeth. We are not going to be deceived in that way. We felt that there was a much more important question underlying this matter than many people suppose; and, for my part, I do not mean to sink that more important question to the exigencies of party. I do not care a pin whether this motion be carried or not, but I have the utmost scorn for any honorable gentlemen who, for the sake of obtaining a mere party triumph, are content to abandon their privileges. This is not a question of this session or this Parliament—it is a question which will affect our institutions for generations to come. I ask the House not to be misled. There are people who say, "This is an unimportant matter. What we want to do is to get our Bills passed through, so that we may go home;" but I say that the moment this Parliament allows its privileges to be infringed it is entering upon the first stage of decay, while, on the other hand, the Parliament which resists the first attempt to infringe its privileges is the one which is taking a proper stand in defence of its own rights. The House is being called upon now to abandon the strong position it has held, and to throw that position to the winds. I hope the House will not consent to this proposal for adjournment. We are now in communication with the Governor, and he has given us good reasons for not replying to our message. It is well known that by the outgoing mail all this correspondence will go to the Secretary of State, without an expression of opinion on the part of this House. I may say that I am quite prepared to stake my position on a question of this kind. It is a question on which, to my mind, any Ministry should be proud to go out of office. All we wish to ascertain is, how far the privileges of this House are to be invaded. We might have resigned, and we might have resigned without bringing back the old party to office; but I contend that my honorable friend the Premier pursued the proper course when he declined to resign until he had seen how far our privileges were to be invaded. Whatever may be the result of this motion, or of this session, I shall look back with pleasure to the part I have taken in defending the privileges of this House even against His Excellency the Governor. I say this is a matter which ought not to be postponed for a week. An honorable gentleman has said that the question has been raised for the purpose of enabling us to pick a bone with the Governor; but I say that it is not so. The question at issue was simply whether or not His Excellency the Governor should act on the advice of his Advisers respecting the appointment of a gentleman to a seat in the Legislative Council. I hope the motion for the adjournment of the debate will not be agreed to.

Mr. HODGKINSON. — I shall oppose the adjournment of the debate. I think the honorable member for Totara has given sufficient reasons why the debate should not be adjourned, and I think that no other reasons than those urged by that honorable gentleman are needed. As regards the proposal of the honorable member for Wellington Country Districts that, as a matter of courtesy, we should wait until the Governor gets the opinion of the Secretary of State or Sir Hercules Robinson, I can only say that I think it is absurd. In my opinion the question should be gone on with at once. As I understand this question, it appears to me that, since the House decided that there was one breach of privilege, a second case of breach of privilege has arisen. The Governor lays it down distinctly that the case cannot be settled in the colony, and therefore he has decided to forward it for the consideration and decision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Then his Excellency says, "In conclusion, the Governor would wish to state that, in reply to a telegram from himself, he has heard from Sir Hercules Robinson that a precedent, which appears very nearly similar, did occur to Lord Belmore, and that his action was approved of by the Secretary of State." He assumes that our decisions are to be approved of by the Secretary of State; and I say that that is an infringement of the privileges of this House. This sort of thing cannot be decided anywhere out of the colony. I shall vote against the adjournment; and, moreover, if we agree to adjourn for a week the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) may change his mind again.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, shame has been cast on this Assembly by the remarks which fell from the honorable member for Egmont. He said that these questions of our privileges were to be submitted to the decision of the Secretary of State. Sir, when the honorable gentleman said this, he implied shame to the people of New Zealand, and he has brought shame upon himself by telling us that it was our duty to submit questions of that kind to the decision of any foreign authority. I will say, further, that shame falls upon the Opposition for not proceeding with the vote of censure on the Government which they brought forward, and for allowing that vote of censure to stand over, so that, as they believed, the correspondence between His Excellency and the Government, and the statement that a vote of censure upon the Government was pending, would leave the colony concurrently. Not that we care for that. Those labour under a mistake who think that this Government will so far forget itself as to forward any explanation to the Secretary of State either regarding the question of privilege which has been raised or the proposed vote of censure of the Opposition. We know too well what we owe to this House and the country to demean ourselves to that extent. I ask the House patiently to consider the points which have been raised, and which are to be submitted to some external authority, and then to consider whether this debate should be adjourned. The first point is this: The Governor claims the right of declining to take the advice of his Responsible Ministers whilst a vote of want of confidence is pending: that is to say, that, if there are succesive motions of want of confidence moved, the Governor of New Zealand may, for an indefinite term, govern without Responsible Advisers. Now, Sir, we believed that that was a question which we ought to consider. That was to us an entirely new question; and I almost think, Sir, that the Governor has been encouraged by the conduct of previous Administrations in the belief that he possessed those powers. Perhaps the late Administration allowed him to exercise them without remonstrance: I almost think so. We felt it to be our duty to test the question. Though we thought that the Governor, if he chose, had a perfect right to maintain that he had those powers, we believed that those powers were not constitutionally vested in His Excellency, and that consequently we had a right to test the question. We believed, further, that the only tribunal before which this question could be brought was this House. My colleagues and myself had to act under novel circumstances, and we deemed it to be our duty to use no language which could offend anybody, but simply to lay the papers before the House, and let the House take whatever action it thought proper regarding them. I hold that we appealed to the proper tribunal, and that we took the proper means of trying the appeal. If we were wrong, we were the parties who should suffer; and, if the Governor was wrong, what harm could have happened to him? Well, Sir, additional questions have now arisen, which I think this House alone can decide, and I think it ought to decide them promptly. We are told that the Governor is responsible to the Secretary of State alone. I believe that that is a most dangerous doctrine. Now, I will define what the true position of the Secretary of State to the Governor ought to be—but I may say that that position has within the last few years been unconstitutionally altered. The true position of the Governor to the Secretary of State ought to be this: The Secretary of State ought to recommend Her Majesty to appoint a certain gentleman to be Governor of a colony. But the Secretary of State does not now use language of that kind. He says to the Governor, "I have appointed you," or, "I now appoint you." I hold that that language is incorrect, unlawfully used, and derogatory alike to the dignity of the Queen and to the rights of her subjects. The moment the Secretary of State has appointed a Governor, all responsibility of the Governor to the Secretary of State ceases. The Governor then becomes responsible to the laws and to the Constitution of the colony to which he has been appointed. He knows nothing of the Secretary of State; he knows nothing but his duty to the country which he governs, and the oath which he has taken, to govern according to law. It might as justly be said, when a Judge is placed on the bench by a superior authority, that the Judge is responsible to the authority which placed him there. No such responsibility exists. The powers of a Governor are transcendental, exceeding even those of a Judge. In his hands alone rests the issue of life and death—the last appeals of the condemned for pardon; in his hands rest many powers of that kind. Can it be said that for the exercise of such powers as he by law holds he is responsible to the Secretary of State? Is he not responsible to the laws of his country, to the laws and the Constitution of the country which he may govern? We ought to settle that question and decide that point. Again, Sir, we are told that the Secretary of State has the power of deciding these questions of great rights and privileges which are under our consideration. His Excellency has stated that, and the honorable member for Egmont has stated it in the face of this House. But I say that of the Secretary of State we absolutely know nothing—for the Secretary of State we absolutely care nothing. The Constitution Act of this colony expressly says that the only relation in which the Secretary of State stands to us is this: that, upon certain subjects, he communicates to this Government Her Majesty's commands. That is the whole duty of the Secretary of State. Let him confine himself to his proper functions and to his proper duties, as I believe he will. We will confine ourselves to our functions and to our duties, and we will see that no respect is wanting to ourselves. Whatever the honorable member for Egmont may say, and whatever his supporters may say in this House, he will find that the statement he has made this night is not one which he ought to have made. It is a statement which will never receive sanction here or from the people of the colony. These questions are really questions of the most vital importance. Let us reflect for one moment upon our position. Undoubtedly there is some correspondence going on between the Governor here and the Governors of the other colonies on this question; and I say it behoves all of us to take care that no other advisers but ourselves are called on to give counsel or advice upon the issues that are before us. Sir Hercules Robinson has nothing to do with us. We do not interfere with him. No external authority shall interfere here. The people of New Zealand are perfectly capable of settling these questions themselves. Our statesmen, I contend, are no whit behind those of any other country. All sorts of questions of the most embarrassing nature, which may shatter the Empire, may arise, if this kind of interference is permitted. You are aware that in other colonies questions have arisen as to the conditions under which dissolutions are to be allowed by the Governors, and various precedents are being set up in those colonies. If once the principle is established that the various colonial Governors may consult with one another, and really establish a code of laws for these colonies, the most disastrous results must take place. I say that we ought, at the outset of proceedings of this kind, quietly and in a proper spirit, simply to say that we will ourselves maintain our absolute rights—that, as the people of Great Britain are entirely free in their form of government as administered in the British Islands, so we are absolutely free in our form of government as administered in New Zealand. We must maintain this: that our statesmen, within the limits of New Zealand, are as capable of deciding what their rights are, and of faithfully and properly upholding those rights, as the statesmen of Great Britain are capable of maintaining their rights within the limits of the British Islands. The statesmen of Great Britain possess the right of claiming a dissolution under certain circumstances, and we have the same right. If they have the right of claiming a dissolution absolutely unfettered by all conditions, and if the Crown never imposes conditions on the statesmen of England when it grants a dissolution, are we not to be trusted with the same freedom? Really these questions do not only contain the substance that appears on the first inspection, but there are lying hidden beneath them great principles, which claim our most earnest attention. What I think has not been sufficiently considered is this: that, when we talk of remitting this question to the decision of the Secretary of State, as was proposed to-night in this House, we must remember that the Secretary of State for the time being may be considered as the exponent of the feelings and the principles of a certain party; that the views of parties alter in England, and alter more especially in reference to the Colonial Empire. Some twenty years ago—I think it was not longer ago than that—the desire of the party then in power was to break up the Empire. That desire was frequently expressed in the most open language; that desire was followed out by patent acts; that desire was actually in some respects accomplished. For instance, in South Africa they did break up the Empire; they did, at the sole will of the Secretary of State, separate certain portions of the Queen's subjects from the rest of Her Majesty's subjects; they did declare, without the authority of Parliament, that British subjects inhabiting certain territories, whose lands had been granted to them by the Crown, who had been for years living under the Crown, and faithfully attached to it, should, from and after a certain date, without the authority or consent of Parliament, cease to be Her Majesty's subjects. Those acts were accomplished by the sole will of the Government for the time being. The right of the Government to accomplish such acts was contested by a number of men, myself amongst others. We were told that legal opinions had been taken at Home, to ascertain whether these powers existed; we were told that legal opinions were taken that satisfied the Secretary of State; but we were never told that the opinions of the proper law officers of the Crown, of the Attorney- and Solicitor-Generals, had been taken on these points; and I am sure they never had been taken until the acts were completed. Those acts were performed: and now, at the end of twenty years, it is generally admitted that those acts were absolutely unlawful. In that case, a party were about silently to break up the Empire, and to provide that for the future a great part of the Anglo-Saxon race was to be broken up into small powerless communities, without any common bond of union. This was to be done against their own consent: without their own knowledge it was to be done; without any previous preparation for such a change was this great event to have been brought about. I believe that certain similar acts recently done in reference to New Zealand will hereafter be found to have been unlawfully done. We were told that legal opinions had been taken in reference to those acts. I believe that the opinions of the British Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, in reference to the meaning of the Act of Parliament under which they purported to have been done, never have been taken. But recently, within the last few months, I read this expression as having been used in the British Parliament: a Minister of the Crown, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, speaking of the proceedings for breaking up the Empire to which I have alluded, said, "the present Government viewed them with detestation" (I think "detestation" was the word he used); the Empire, it was said, was now to be held together and to be welded together. And then, as part of their proceedings, they took up a plan of mine for the federation of the whole of the South African States. This bears on what is going on here, and is well worthy of consideration, as showing the tendency of party feeling at this moment in England on this particular subject. They have resolved to weld the Empire into one great federation; and that is, I am sure, a result which every one of us would delight to see. We should all be glad to see the whole English-speaking race ultimately bound together by one common bond, thus forming a federation able, silently and unostentatiously, to preserve the peace of the world by its latent power alone. Now what is to take place under the new Act of the Imperial Parliament with the various States of South Africa?—for there are many of them. According to my plan, those of them that elected their own Governor were, if they joined the federation, still to be at liberty to do so. Those that had two Chambers were to continue to have two Chambers; and the Upper House, in each such case, was to continue an elective body, according to the Constitutions which existed. Those that had only one Chamber, elected by the people, were still to have one Chamber so elected; and they were all to have the power of regulating their own internal form of government. But, by the Act recently passed, the Constitution forced upon New Zealand, or a Constitution precisely similar in form, is to be forced upon each State which comes into the federation. Whether its Governor is elected or not, from the moment it comes under the federation the Governor is to be nominated by the Crown. Although its Legislative Council may be elective, from the moment it comes under the federation the Council is to be nominated by the Crown. The party in power at the present time in the British Government are attempting to set up throughout the Empire a similar form of Constitution in every one of the dependencies of the Crown, thus destroying that variety of Constitution which, in my belief, would tend more than anything else to the peace, happiness, and welfare of the whole Empire, because affording those differing forms of government which geographical position and configuration, distinctions of race, distinctions of laws, distinctions of language, and distinctions of customs absolutely demand. Under such a system, such differences and diversities of forms of government, under one great federation, would have existed as would have allowed experiments and advances in political knowledge, and would have created an emulation amongst nations as to their respective forms of government, which must have produced valuable results. Undoubtedly, an attempt is being made at the present moment to reduce the whole of the Imperial colonial dependencies to one set form of institutions; and I say that it is our duty to take care that the colonial Governors do not amongst themselves settle any question with which we ought alone to deal, and equally to take care that a question the decision of which rests absolutely with us should not be referred to the Secretary of State. I say that it would be the most disastrous thing that could happen to us at present, if we permitted any such settlement, or sanctioned any such reference. Let it be remembered that the States it is now attempted, by indirect means, to coerce, and force into one form of government, will soon, from the rapid increase and energy of the Anglo-Saxon race, form a large proportion of the inhabitants of the world; and the form of their institutions is therefore a most momentous question. I do trust that the House, having entered upon the discussion of this question, will not now falter; that the Opposition, having threatened the Government with a vote of censure, will have the courage to go on with it, and will not now shrink in a cowardly spirit from doing what is their duty to themselves and their duty to this country. And, Sir, I hope that the honorable gentleman who gave notice of this vote of censure upon the Government, will himself have the manliness to go on with that which he undertook. If he is truly the representative of the people of Wellington City—if their desire is to abandon their rights and privileges, and to refer to the decision of a foreign authority a matter which the people of the colony ought to decide for themselves—let him have the courage to endeavour to continue to enforce that desire. If not, then let him have the manliness to admit that he has committed an error. If he feels that he has done wrong—that in the step he has taken he is not supported by his constituents—he will but do justice to himself, to those whom he represents, and to the Government, by withdrawing his notice of motion for a vote of censure.

Major ATKINSON.—The honorable gentleman entirely misrepresents what I said. I never for a moment would consent to allow any person to interfere with the privileges of this House. I said distinctly that, in my opinion, it was not a question of the privileges of this House, but a constitutional question involved in the relationship between His Excellency the Governor and his Advisers. I shall never be found handing over to any one the privileges of this House, or appealing from this House, as the honorable member himself has done, to the Secretary of State to set aside its doings.

Sir G. GREY.—I submit that this is a question which we should settle. The Secretary of State has nothing whatever to do with the relations between the Governor of New Zealand and his Responsible Advisers: he should confine himself to his own business.

Mr. J. C. Brown,
Mr. Reynolds.

The motion was consequently agreed to.

Major ATKINSON.—I move, That the debate be adjourned to this day week.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I should like once more to show the inconsistency of the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers). He gives notice of a resolution, and then, when a division is called for, so that the question may be taken into consideration, he actually votes against it. I shall move, as an amendment, That the debate be adjourned till half-past ten o'clock this evening. In doing that, I intend to give the honorable gentleman an opportunity to show that he is really in earnest in advocating the censure upon the Government. There can be no question in the mind of any honorable member here but that, instead of the privileges of this House being guarded by both sides of the House, the members of the Opposition have made this a party question. I am not advocating either one side or the other—either the adoption or rejection of the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City. I do not know that I should agree to any amendment that might be proposed even by the Government, and I do not at the present time say what are my views upon the subject. I shall, however, call for another division, in order that the honorable member for Wellington City may show his consistency by voting with me when I propose that the debate be adjourned until half-past ten o'clock this evening. I trust, if there is some good reason why the debate should not be taken this evening, that it will be adjourned till half-past two to-morrow; and then let us get this question off the Order Paper altogether. I would withdraw my motion if it were more in harmony with the wishes of the House that the debate should be resumed to-morrow.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I hope the honorable member for Port Chalmers will consent, if the honorable member for Egmont will do so, to the adjournment of the debate till Friday next. That will give plenty of time to go on with the Land Bill, and will also enable the House to have its views upon this important question sent by the same mail as His Excellency the Governor is about to submit the question of the constitutional privileges of this Parliament to the Secretary of State. Surely the honorable member for Egmont does not object to our views being sent Home at the same time as His Excellency has his sent. I cannot possibly understand that the honorable gentleman would place the House in a humiliating position, and I therefore hope he and the honorable member for Port Chalmers will consent that the debate shall be resumed on Friday. That will give time for some resolution to be arrived at. If it is agreed with His Excellency the Governor that questions affecting the principles of our constitutional government should be submitted to the Secretary of State, well and good—let this question go by the same mail as His Excellency's despatch goes. But if we do not agree with His Excellency's views, then let our remonstrance go by the same mail. If I can do so, I will move, That the debate be adjourned till half-past two o'clock on Friday, and that the question have precedence at that time.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Leave given, and amendment withdrawn.

Mr. REES.—I understand that the leader of the Opposition does not agree to the amendment.

Major ATKINSON.—No. I understand that two members on the opposite side propose to move the previous question.

Mr. REES.—Then I take it that the Opposition, or what stands for an Opposition, have determined that there shall be no expression of opinion from this House sent Home at the same time as the Governor's despatch is forwarded. In that case the Opposition are not only dragging representative institutions into contempt, but are making themselves personally objects for laughter all over the country; and not one of them who will face his constituents—I know there are many who would never dream of doing such a thing—will be able to justify his conduct of to-night whether he meets them in the course of two or three months or two or three years. But, be that as it may, they should remember that at present they hold a sacred trust from their constituents, and they ought to be careful that they do not surrender the privileges of this House, or, in other words, the privileges of the people. Are the privileges of this House to be handed over to a judge not constituted by this Assembly, and not recognized by the Constitution Act, but who merely has power to appoint a portion of the Government of the colony—the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs in England? We are not only asked by a majority of one—I should like to know who the one is—

Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honorable member for Wellington City.

Mr. REES.—No doubt the honorable member for Wellington City is a fair representative of the Opposition—a body with no cohesion, without reason in its argument, and which has forfeited every shadow of self-respect.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable gentleman must see that he is travelling beyond the question. The question is, the debate having been adjourned, when it shall be resumed.

Mr. REES.—I trust I shall have some other occasion on which to refer to the Opposition, but I hope the House will consent to this matter being adjourned till Friday. It is a very reasonable request, so that the matter may be decided before the mail leaves for England.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The amendment was consequently negatived.

Mr. STOUT.—Sir, I did not intend to speak again on this question, but an honorable member near me agreed that a compromise should be come to. That agreement, however, the honorable member saw fit to break. I regret exceedingly that the members of the Opposition have thought fit to treat this as a party question. I hear honorable members laughing, but I am not at all surprised at that, particularly at the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe). That honorable gentleman is quite ignorant of constitutional government, and he is not likely to apply any argument but laughter to a question of this kind. When I first gave notice of this question of privilege I called upon those who might be termed the leaders of the House to stand up for the privileges of the House, not only for the sake of the House, but for the sake of their reputations. Well, what do we see? We see members running about the lobbies and being led about by whips, possessing no mind of their own. And why is this adjournment asked for? Why has it been pressed on with so much eagerness? Solely to get the clauses in the Land Bill which deal with the Canterbury leases passed at once. Last year we saw members telegraphed for to vote upon this question, and a bitter feeling evoked, simply because the Canterbury runholders wished to get their runs on indefeasible leases. A deputation of runholders and property-holders came up specially to urge that upon the House. That is what the adjournment is wanted for now. We saw an honorable member get up, a few days ago, and say that one of the main reasons why he distrusted the Government was that he was afraid the Premier would not give the Canterbury runholders an extension of their leases. That was the gentleman who thought some dire calamity would befall the colony if the doctrine of equal rights prevailed, the meaning of which was that the runholders would lose something which would give to their fellow-colonists what they had a right to claim. I do not wish to charge any one with being a partisan, but the object of these gentlemen goes beyond that of the partisan. It is not the wish to place the honorable member for Egmont in power that actuates those honorable members. There are many honorable members who, like the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), care very little for him, but they are prepared to barter away their independence in this House—for what? To secure the Canterbury leases. What do they care about the Land Bill? Directly they see any provision that tends towards liberalism they vote against it in a block, and so much influence had the honorable member for Timaru over the late Government that he could induce Ministers to go into the lobby against their own Bills. The honorable member for Clive, the honorable member for Egmont, and the honorable member for Kaiapoi were all compelled to follow his lead when he told them some harm would be inflicted upon the Canterbury runholders if the amendment of the honorable member for the Taieri was agreed to. I only hope an opportunity will be afforded to the people of New Zealand to say if they approve of this shuffling conduct. It is contrary to any Parliamentary rule that six or seven members of a House should constantly sway from one side to the other so long as they can carry through their little schemes. I am glad the honorable member for Egmont says "Hear, hear." I should like to know how it is that he can make private bargains with these six or seven men. He has been lobbying for weeks, and promising to carry out certain bargains with these six or seven if his arrangements should prove successful. Sir, this has ceased to be party warfare. It is becoming a mere personal fight, and I only hope the people of New Zealand will have an opportunity of expressing their opinion of such conduct. I do not care if we come back from the country a small minority. I would sooner see eight or ten men bound together upon true principles, having a fixed platform, than I would see a heterogeneous majority, with no defined political creed. I need not allude to the views of particular members in this House. Take them in twos and threes, and what do you find? What are their views on the land question, or the question of the incidence of taxation? They are as wide asunder as the poles. Take any other question of the day, and you will find the same difference of opinion; and yet they ask that this question should be adjourned. Why? Not to preserve the privileges of this House, not to preserve the constitutional liberties of the people of New Zealand, but to carry out a purely partisan and factious feeling. There is no one more anxious than I am to see a proper Land Bill passed; but, from what I have seen in this House, the chances of such a Bill being passed are very remote. Instead of honorable members taking an intelligent interest in the Bill, they come in when the division bell is rung, knowing nothing about the Bill, and caring nothing about it, excepting the Canterbury clauses. They come in and say, "What is the question? how shall I vote?" And they vote as they are told. Then there are other members who take a liberal view of the land question, but they never attend the debates in Committee. Take the case of the honorable member for Egmont. Did he take the trouble to look after a single clause in the Bill? He was never present. Then there is the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers). Did he take any interest in it? Or did the honorable member for Roslyn? There were only two or three members of the Opposition who took the slightest interest in the Bill. The rest cared nothing about any part of it except the clauses relating to the Canterbury runs: they were the Alpha and Omega of the Land Bill. But there is an appeal above this House, and, if the people of the colony have this question placed before them, if they are asked whether they will allow a foreigner to interfere in their affairs, if there are to be factious fights in this House, and if members are to be denied their right to have their measures discussed, the answer will be clear and distinct. The people will not allow it. And one man, who has done more for New Zealand than any man in this House, a man who has taken up a firm position in opposition to the landsharks of this country, who has refused to join rings and combinations, who has governed this country with credit to himself in years gone by, is to be ostracized from political life because of his patriotism and his devotedness to the public interest. The honorable member for Selwyn says the Premier is a radical, and that some dire calamity will befall this colony if he remains in power; but I will not take up the time of the House in debating the point further.

Mr. LUMSDEN.—The honorable member has charged some one sitting near him with having broken his word. That is a very serious charge. When the honorable member asked me if I was favourable to an adjournment to Friday instead of Monday, I said I had no objection. But he put the question again, and I said, "If there is to be any talk about it I will not agree." I then went to the members on the other side of the House, and asked why they insisted upon the adjournment till Monday, and I was told that they had the best reasons for it. I was satisfied with those reasons when given me, and I then voted for Major Atkinson's motion instead of for the amendment.

Mr. STOUT.—Before the honorable member went across to consult with the honorable members for Waikato, Roslyn, and Waikouaiti, he told me he would have the courage of his opinions, and would vote for the adjournment of the debate until Friday.

Mr. LUMSDEN.—It is utterly false. I said I claimed to have the courage of my opinions, and was not to be compelled to follow out on every division precisely the views of the party, unless it pleased me to do so. I did determine to vote straight with the party I usually vote with, after the reasons were submitted to me why it was best to do so.

Mr. STOUT.—I can only repeat what I have stated, and I am glad that the honorable member's statement was heard by the member for Waitaki and others.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR.—I think it is hardly fair of the honorable member for Invercargill not to state what his reasons were—those reasons that determined his vote. Although we are not, perhaps, entitled to be taken into the confidence of the honorable member for Egmont, we ought to know what his reasons are, other than what have been stated in the House, for determining his vote. One may be allowed to draw his own conclusion, and the conclusion I draw is that he desires that the papers shall go Home—that statements shall be made that there is a vote of censure hanging over the Ministers, and that therefore this House has not made up its mind as to whether His Excellency is to blame or not. Well, that is a gospel according to toadyism, and certain honorable members have given in their adhesion to that gospel to-night. I except the honorable member for Wellington City, because he expressed his opinion the other night. I also except the honorable member for Wakatipu, because of his great knowledge of constitutional law. I think the question of adjournment is a very slight matter, because of one speech which we have heard to-night. The Hon. the Premier stood up, and he has given a "Bill of Rights" for this House and this country which, I venture to say, was never heard before in this House in such eloquent and precise terms, and which will remain on record not only to be our guide, but to be our protest in England. I think the matter of adjournment is of very small moment indeed: it has served its turn; it has enabled the adherents of the new gospel to bow at the shrine of toadyism. They have done, and I hope they are satisfied. I think the action taken is hardly a wise action. I hope it may prove to be so; but I fear it will not. I can understand the honorable member for Aron sitting in silence on the opposite side of the House. If it had not been for the question of privileges and the various adjournments, he might have come to the front, taken the position aspired to by the honorable member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers), and might have formed a Ministry. I think there is no object to be gained by this question coming up in the House again, and that the matter of adjournment is of very slight moment. I am quite prepared to discuss the Land Bill, and take the same view I have always consistently taken in opposing the Canterbury clauses.

Mr. WAKEFIELD.—Speaking on the question of adjournment, I would point out that the adjournment of this debate for a week simply means the shelving the whole discussion on the constitutional question. It means this: that the large question—for it is admitted on all sides of the House to be a very large and momentous question—of the relation of the Governor of the colony to this House shall not be discussed at all, but shall be set aside altogether, except in so far as His Excellency shall have an opportunity of representing the matter to the Home Government—that this House is to have no say in the matter whatever; that it shall in no way whatever have its privileges determined; that this Legislature shall have no chance of representing its views even to that tribunal which has been selected by His Excellency as the final tribunal in the matter. I am not going to diverge from the question of the adjournment of the debate, but there are one or two points which bear strongly upon it, although they may not appear to have an immediate bearing on the mere verbal question of adjournment. Putting aside all party questions, I was grieved to see men like the honorable member for Timaru departing from that noble part they have taken in the history of New Zealand—to see them voting against the discussion of a question like this in this House. Why, it must be known quite well that, in 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869, up to the last moment the honorable member for Timaru took a very strong part in resisting the encroachments of the Home Government and the Secretary of State. Mainly on account of his opposition to that encroachment the honorable gentleman was turned out of office, and the honorable member for the Thames (Sir George Grey) was withdrawn from the position of Governor of this colony. How are they to be separated? It was the present Premier who lost his position, that noble position to which he had been invited by Her Majesty under very urgent circumstances; he was dragged from it for the very reason that he resisted the encroachments of the Secretary of State on the Constitution of New Zealand, and the Minister who upheld him in that course lost his position as Premier of New Zealand: that honorable gentleman was the honorable member for Timaru. Will it be denied that one of the main reasons urged against the honorable member for Timaru in 1869, when he left those benches—one of the main reasons urged against the honorable member and his Ministry on leaving those benches—was that they were not in accord with the Secretary of State; that they would quarrel with the Home Government; that we should never have good government in New Zealand until the honorable member for Timaru—who dared to resist the tyrannical encroachments of the Imperial Government—and his colleagues were removed from the position of power which they occupied? I remember quite well that that was one of the great reasons adduced by the honorable member for Wanganui (Mr. Fox) and the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, who now occupies a seat in another branch of the Legislature, that until those honorable gentlemen were removed we should never be in accord with the Home Government. We are aware of the manner in which they defied the Secretary of State to trample upon our liberties; how they dared to speak boldly, and say that they would hold by the Constitution of this colony, and not submit to the ipse dixit of a foreign clerk, as it has been well put by Mr. Higginbotham, a leading and able member of the Legislature of a neighbouring colony. For that very reason they were removed from those benches, and the present Premier was removed from the position of Governor of New Zealand. And yet to-night we have the honorable member for Timaru following a servile party into a servile lobby in a servile manner, and for ever throwing away the reputation which he once held as the best exponent of the Constitution of this country and as the boldest upholder of the rights of the colony. I confess that I felt more grieved this night than I have ever felt since first I took a humble share in the politics of this country at the vote which the honorable member for Timaru has given. I feel that the honorable gentleman and the honorable member for Avon have voted against their consciences to-night; that their votes were simply guided by party feeling and by party prejudice; and that they threw aside by their votes to-night those rights and privileges which will be dear to this country long after the prejudices of the past shall have faded into mere opinions and the passions of the present shall have passed away.

Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I move the adjournment of the House, in order to give the honorable member for Wellington City an opportunity of considering the step he has taken.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—When I addressed the House in the former part of the day on the motion for the adjournment of the debate, I was referring to the remarks of the honorable member for Wellington City on the 5th instant; and, as the motion for the adjournment of the House has opened up the whole question, I now propose to continue my remarks. On the 5th November, the honorable member moved the adoption of the report. Now, what does the report say?—

I should like to ask the honorable member how that tallies with the motion of which he has given notice, and in which he says that Ministers are deserving of the censure of the House. There is no word of censure in that report, or in the remarks of the honorable gentleman. On the contrary, I shall be able to show further on that he perfectly agreed with Ministers that they had done their duty. Then he goes on to say,—

“The Committee were of opinion that a breach of the privileges of the House had been committed; and I think it my duty to endeavour to satisfy this House that it would be justified in accepting the report of the Committee, not as assuming that His Excellency was guilty of a wilful breach of the privileges of this House, but as evincing a determination on the part of this House to vindicate its privileges.”

Again not a word with reference to the Ministry. It is simply that the House is bound to vindicate its own privileges. Then, in referring to His Excellency declining to accept the recommendation of his Ministers, he stated,— “Something may be said in regard to the publication of those reasons, and to the fact that those reasons were given by His Excellency to his Advisers in connection with the confidential relations which existed between them and himself. But, nevertheless, it appears to me that the very use of those reasons, although strictly confidential, would have amounted to a breach of the privileges of this House.”

That is, on the part of His Excellency, and not on the part of the Ministry. Again, with regard to laying the memorandum of His Excellency on the table, he says,—

“The House is, therefore, by the act of His Excellency himself”—not by the act of Ministers

—“in possession of those reasons; and, being in possession of them, the House is perfectly justified in considering, irrespective of all questions of confidential relations between himself and his Government, whether those reasons do or do not constitute a breach of the privileges of this House.”—

—clearly showing that the honorable member for Wellington City threw the whole blame upon His Excellency the Governor, and not upon the Government. Then he blames His Excellency because he took notice of any debates which were going on in this House, and he says,—

“In dealing with the question submitted to him by his Ministers, he took notice of a debate in this House upon the result of which would depend the fate of his Ministry. The action of His Excellency in adducing those reasons for refusing to accede to the request of his Ministers was, inadvertently no doubt, bringing the weight of his own opinion in regard to the Ministry to bear upon the consideration of the question before this House.”

And yet, Sir, the same honorable member, who made these remarks only seven days ago, is now changing his tactics, and endeavouring to pass a vote of censure upon the Government, instead of, as he then did, on the Governor. Again, he says,—

“This House would have been justified in accepting those reasons as indicative of a want of confidence on the part of His Excellency in his Ministry; and we must not forget that, when a gentleman occupying his high position does in any degree indicate that state of feeling towards his Ministers in so formal a manner as he has done in his memorandum, he is, to a certain extent, bringing the pressure of his opinion to bear on this House.”

So, according to his view, a few days ago the Governor was bringing the pressure of his opinion to bear upon the House as against the honorable gentlemen on the Government benches. That is the meaning of the honorable gentleman's remarks. I have no desire to waste your time, and will quote no further from the honorable member's remarks, excepting this, to show that he did not expect Ministers to resign. There was nothing in his previous remarks on the 1st November which would indicate that it was his idea that Ministers should resign. He says,—

“The question before us is not the refusal of His Excellency the Governor to accept the advice of Ministers. If we were called upon to discuss that question, I think that the arguments of the honorable member for Avon would certainly be perfectly conclusive on the point, and the Ministry could not call upon us to defend their conduct unless they had first placed their resignations in the hands of His Excellency.”

Mr. TRAVERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—Quite so. The Government did not call upon the House at all to defend their action; neither did the honorable member ever say that they called upon the House to defend their action. The Government, by instruction from His Excellency, laid on the table certain memoranda, and upon those memorandas a Select Committee was appointed. That Committee submitted a report, and the honorable member moved the adoption of that report, which certainly bore no censure on the Government; and yet, within seven days of carrying that report, the honorable gentleman now proposes to censure the Government. I must say I congratulate the electors of this Empire City on having such an able representative as the honorable member who has given notice of this motion—a representative who, with a great amount of modest assurance, has the capacity and ability to argue a question from both points of view, and then to argue it in such a way as to convince every member of the Opposition that it is their duty not to allow him to bring forward his resolution at all. And then the honorable gentleman even assists them, inasmuch as he votes with them to burke his own motion. I think, under these circumstances, and seeing that the members of the Opposition have made it a party question, that it would be far better to adjourn the House, and thus stop any discussion whatever on the subject.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I would venture to address a few observations to the House, for it certainly appears to me that the honorable member for Port Chalmers entirely misapprehends the position of the question now before us. I will endeavour, if possible, to make it clear to him. I say “if possible,” because I have already pointed out the position, and the honorable member really does not seem able to understand it. The memoranda of His Excellency were placed upon the table. There were two questions which would naturally arise from them. The first was raised by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout), as to whether or not the Governor, in giving reasons to his Ministers for refusing their advice, had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House. That was a question entirely separate from the other, and one which we could discuss, as it appeared to me, absolutely irrespective of the question of the relationship of the Government to His Excellency. The second was the constitutional question raised on the face of these memoranda—arising through this: that the Governor had refused to accept the advice of his Ministers on a point on which they were entitled to advise him. The doctrine with regard to the appointment of Peers in England at present is, that that which was formerly considered to be purely a personal prerogative of the Crown has passed to the Commons of England, and it is through the advice of Ministers, as a rule, that Peers are now created. The Crown does not of its own mere motion exercise its personal prerogative at all. Except in the appointment, it acts invariably on the advice of its Ministers. Now, if the Crown were to refuse the advice of Ministers in England in respect to the appointment of a Peer, there would be a clear constitutional question between the Crown and Ministers, and that question need not necessarily be complicated by anything affecting the privileges of the House of Commons. We will suppose that, when Ministers advised His Excellency to appoint Mr. Wilson to a seat in the Legislative Council, he had simply said, "Gentlemen, I must decline to take your advice in this matter, and I refuse to make the appointment," without giving any reasons. What would the position have been? It would have been this: that His Excellency had refused to accept the advice of his Constitutional Advisers; and that would have raised purely a question of constitutional conduct as between them. They would naturally have said, "If His Excellency is not prepared to accept our advice on a matter of this kind, we have no alternative but to resign."

Mr. STOUT.—No.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Well, I am supposing they took that course. "If you refuse to accept our advice, we must tender our resignations." If, instead of its remaining a matter of private conversation, as it did in the first instance, between the honorable member for the Thames and His Excellency, the request to appoint Mr. Wilson had been embodied in a written memorandum, and His Excellency had signified his refusal to make the appointment, without giving any reason, that would have raised a constitutional question pure and simple. Nothing else would have been involved in it, and Ministers would have had a right to say that His Excellency was placing himself in antagonism to his Government, and therefore in antagonism to this House, assuming that the Government possessed the confidence of the House. And the Government would have been in this further position: If they chose to retain office they were bound to defend His Excellency. That is the constitutional position. The Governor only appears in this House by his Advisers, and if they choose to retain that position they are bound to defend his action.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. TRAVERS.—The honorable member who says "No" knows nothing of the well-known proposition in constitutional usage in Great Britain. I will quote from Mr. Taswell-Langmead's work on English Constitutional History, in reference to the position Ministers occupy as between the Crown and the House. He says,—

"Under this system, 'the Ministry,' says Lord Macaulay, 'is, in fact, a Committee of leading members of the two Houses. It is nominated by the Crown; but it consists exclusively of statesmen whose opinions on the passing questions of the time agree in the main with the opinions of the majority of the House of Commons. In Parliament the Ministers are bound to act as one man on all questions relating to the executive government. If one of them dissents from the rest on a question too important to admit of compromise, it is his duty to retire. While the Ministers retain the confidence of the Parliamentary majority, that majority supports them against opposition, and rejects every motion which reflects on them or is likely to embarrass them. If they forfeit that confidence, if the Parliamentary majority is dissatisfied, they have merely to declare that they have ceased to trust the Ministry, and to ask for a Ministry which they can trust.' Not the least of the many advantages which have accrued from the establishment of this form of Parliamentary government has been the increased security of the Crown and of its Ministers. The old constitutional maxim that 'the King can do no wrong' is now literally true, for his acts are really the acts of his Ministers; and his Ministers are responsible to the House of Commons not merely, as of old, for any breach of the law, but for the general course of their policy, which must accord with the opinions of the majority of that House, or else, in conformity with a constitutional usage practically as binding as a legal enactment, the Ministers are bound to resign office."

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Then I do not understand the constitutional position. Ministers are responsible for the acts of the Crown, and if the Crown refuses to do an executive act upon the advice of Ministers they have only the alternative of resigning or defending that act. The act of the Crown is the act of Ministers, and Ministers are responsible to Parliament for it. Suppose the Governor had not refused to appoint Mr. Wilson, and this House had disapproved of that appointment, I should like to know on whom the responsibility would have rested. The responsibility would have rested with Ministers; and, the Governor having refused to appoint Mr. Wilson, they were bound to defend that act or resign. My honorable friend opposite laughs, but that doctrine is to be found in every elementary book on the Constitution, and I defy any honorable member to produce any work upon constitutional law which contains a single word at variance with what I have read. Had the Crown made an improper appointment by the advice of Ministers, Ministers would have had to defend that appointment, and if the Crown refuses to make the appointment they are bound to justify that refusal or resign office; and that is the course the Government would have taken had they known their position. No doubt, for party purposes, my honorable friend opposite (Mr. Rees) will support the Government, whether they are acting constitutionally or not.

Mr. REES.—No.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Unquestionably my honorable friend is quite prepared to do so, and also prepared to hound down the Constitution if it suits the purpose of his party to do so. I have heard a great many suggestions about party lately, and I would like to read a few passages from the work of a shrewd observer, a man well qualified to judge, a man who has had more experience than all the members of this House put together, and who knows what party means in the greatest Assembly in the world. I am quoting from Lord John Russell; and what does he say? He illustrates what takes place in this House every day, and which, unfortunately, seems to be incident to political warfare. He says,—

"Among the bad effects of party is to be reckoned the want of candour it necessarily produces. Few men can enter into the heat of political contention, backed by a body of friends, who animate and support each other, without attributing to their adversaries bad intentions and corrupt motives, of which they are no more capable than themselves."

I scarcely ever find an honorable member rise on the other side of the House who does not impute the most corrupt motives to honorable members on this side. The speech of my honorable friend the member for Rodney—I do not know what to call him in the multiplicity of the titles he now holds, therefore I must apologize if I have not given him his due title; at any rate, I believe I may call him the Native Minister—the other night was a case in point. I defy anybody who reads it to deny that it is a speech which should never have been delivered. It was redolent with charges of the grossest possible character—charges which I can hardly find words to characterize—against honorable members on this side of the House. He imputed motives thoroughly base, and used the most disgraceful language, telling us “they simply wished to replace gentlemen on those benches for the sake of the pelf they might get and the advantage they would reap from residing in residences rent-free,” and taunted them by saying that if they got back it would be at reduced salaries. Sir, such language is thoroughly offensive, and should never have been used to gentlemen possessing seats in this House. I have no hesitation in saying that there are members on this side of the House as pure-minded and honorable, and as little desirous of possessing themselves of pelf and plunder, as any honorable gentlemen on those benches. In that respect, those honorable gentlemen have no right to use such language. Lord Russell continues,—

“Another evil is, that men become unwilling to give way to the natural bent of their minds, when their understandings would lead them to admit any error upon which their adversaries have insisted, or to render them liable to reproach for weakness and inconsistency. Obstinacy in supporting wrong, because an admission of what was right and true would give a triumph to opposition, has led many a Minister of England into a course most injurious to the country.”

It is the same here, and honorable gentlemen opposite are in no degree exempt from the frailties which have characterized members who have sat on those benches before. No honorable gentleman has a right to impute such motives as are continually imputed from the opposite side. We can spurn such suggestions, and we may gain some little consolation from the belief that, if motives on either side could be examined, we might find that honorable gentlemen on the opposite side are perhaps not so pure as ourselves. I have no doubt that there is more than one honorable gentleman on the Government benches who regrets to hear such imputations cast forth. But I was speaking about the constitutional position, and endeavouring to point out to an honorable member who seemed to know little about the matter, and who quoted my speeches to show my inconsistency, that he absolutely knew nothing of the question at issue. As I said before, if the Governor had refused to make the appointment, and had given no reason for his refusal, the Ministry must have resigned or must have been prepared to defend his action. But the Governor did give reasons, and those reasons, as it appeared to me, amounted to a breach of the privileges of this House. But that was entirely independent of—though connected, it is true, with the transaction—the refusal to appoint Mr. Wilson; and we were quite justified in disconnecting the two things for the purpose of dealing with them. Why, at the very first meeting of the Committee, the honorable member for Dundedin City (Mr. Stout) proposed resolutions expressly disconnecting the two things. I call the attention of the House specially to the terms of the resolution. He first proposed,—

“That the Committee proceed to consider whether any privilege of Parliament has been infringed by His Excellency the Governor in his memorandum of the 27th of October, 1877, relative to the appointment of Mr. J. N. Wilson to the Legislative Council, in so far as His Excellency has taken notice of a matter in debate in Parliament, and allowed himself to be guided in his conduct as Governor by such a debate.”

The House will observe the limitation—“in so far as His Excellency has taken notice of a matter in debate.” We were to go no further; but the honorable member, in order to more carefully limit our inquiry, and to prevent there being any possibility of our straying from the object of our inquiry, added this to the motion: “That the Committee do not consider it necessary to proceed to investigate the fitness or unfitness of Mr. Wilson, nor as to any difference of opinion between His Excellency and his Ministers not affecting the privileges of the House.” So the honorable gentleman himself expressly limited the issue to the pure question of privilege arising out of the fact that His Excellency had taken notice of a debate in this House in order to regulate his executive action, though it is true that the honorable member afterwards sought to reverse the resolution. We therefore proceeded to consider the question of privilege, entirely irrespective of any other question, on the honorable member's own invitation. And then, when the report was brought up, we proceeded to discuss the question entirely irrespective of the question of the constitutional relations between the Governor and the Ministry. It was never touched, and indeed was expressly excluded. But, because it was expressly excluded while discussing the question of privilege, do honorable members suppose it was not present to the mind of honorable members? It was present to my mind that there had been a gross violation by Ministers of constitutional usage in this matter, a violation which it was quite justifiable for the House to consider at a subsequent time, irrespective altogether of the question of privilege. I wish it to be understood that I never said one word in regard to the question of the constitutional relations between the Governor and his Ministers. The honorable member for Port Chalmers, who quotes from my speech, chooses to forget everything that was said by the honorable member for Avon. What was the contention of that honorable gentleman? He said,—

“I have risen to a point of order, because I think that this is a question which deserves the fullest consideration at the hands of the House.

As I have said, it is the first principle of constitutional government that the Crown can do no wrong, and that principle seems to me to be affirmed by the fact that the Crown is only known to Parliament through its Ministers. The moment that Ministers cease to be able to defend the Crown, they tender their resignations, in order that others may be appointed as the representatives of the Crown."

In my opening remarks, in the speech referred to by the honorable member for Port Chalmers, I said,—

"The question before us is not the refusal of His Excellency the Governor to accept the advice of Ministers. If we were called upon to discuss that question, I think that the arguments of the honorable member for Avon would certainly be perfectly conclusive on the point, and the Ministry could not call upon us to defend their conduct unless they had first placed their resignations in the hands of His Excellency."

The very first thing I said was that we absolutely refused to consider the question of the position which Ministers occupied either towards this House or towards the Governor, and we confined ourselves to the consideration of the reasons given by the Governor for his own refusal to accept the advice of his Ministers. I never exonerated Ministers in the slightest degree in respect to the course they took. In my opinion they were guilty of a breach of constitutional usage in allowing to be placed on the table of this House that which contained, on the face of it, a breach of the privileges of the House without being prepared to defend the action of His Excellency in respect to the matter. That was unconstitutional, and the first impulse of the Premier should have been to take the course pointed out, and say to His Excellency, "Get other Advisers; and not only must you get other Advisers, but you must get other Advisers who will be satisfied that you are doing right in refusing to appoint Mr. Wilson to the Upper House." What would have been the position of honorable members if His Excellency had accepted their resignations? Ministers who took their positions must have come down and said that His Excellency was justified in refusing to appoint Mr. Wilson. And, with all the party feeling that exists, I doubt whether any Ministry could have come down and accepted that position, particularly as it was mixed up with a breach of the privileges of this House. I am in no degree inconsistent, therefore, in advocating a course for vindicating the privileges of this House, on the one hand, as between this House and His Excellency, having reference exclusively to the reasons given by His Excellency for not acting upon the advice of his Ministers, and then saying, on the other hand, that his Ministers did not occupy a constitutional position in this House in reference to their position. The two things are entirely distinct and separable, and many honorable members who might be perfectly willing to vote for the motion on one point might be perfectly unwilling to vote for the motion on the other point. That was the position. I may state frankly, in reference to the notice of motion I gave, that I gave that notice with the full impression that the House had ordered the matter to be taken into consideration at half-past seven. I was absolutely under that belief—so completely so, that I went to the Clerk and to the Speaker, because I believed that there had been a mistake in the Order Paper. That is the position in which I stand; but I stand also in this position: that I do not wish to force that motion on the House in opposition to the view of the leader of the party to which I belong. I have been accused more than once, and several other honorable members who have acted with me have been accused, of seceding from the party I belonged to in the first instance. I seceded from that party for this simple reason: that those who asked me to join the party had pledged themselves with reference to one matter, and they broke their words. The one stipulation which I made for my continuance in that party was that the honorable member for the Thames should not be placed at the head of the Government: I stated that distinctly to those who asked me to join that party, and I seceded from them because that understanding was distinctly violated. It is not because I do not wish to see the honorable member for the Thames at the head of a party in this House. There are probably few men who entertain a higher respect for that honorable gentleman than I do. I know that he has rendered great services to his country, and I know, moreover, that his country has been ungrateful to him, and that he has been a victim of circumstances which did him great honor. It has been already said that the honorable member for the Thames has suffered for his loyalty to New Zealand, and I cannot forget, some few years ago when that honorable gentleman was leaving New Zealand, the testimony that was shown to him in this very city. I consider it a disgrace to the British Government that the honorable gentleman should be sitting in this House instead of occupying a far higher position. Everybody knew that the honorable gentleman looked forward to a long career of honor, and he has been very badly treated, as it appears to me, by the Home Government. He has been made very largely the victim of his loyalty to this country. But, notwithstanding that, I do not wish—I have my own reasons for it—to see the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government in this House. That may appear strange and paradoxical, but I cannot help that. I say, again, that it was simply because I received a most distinct and positive assurance—

Mr. REES.—From whom?

Mr. TRAVERS.—From a great many. It was a most distinct stipulation. The honorable member for Avon also joined the party upon that understanding; and the honorable member for Totara was assured—

Mr. REES.—By whom?

Mr. TRAVERS.—By those with whom the honorable member for Auckland City East was working, who were appointed by the honorable member for the Thames to confer upon the matter. That was my reason. I have insisted upon that from the very beginning, but not because there was any want of respect towards the honorable gentleman on my part. I deprecate charges of tergiversation of that kind. The honorable member for Auckland City East is loyal to his party, and I trust I shall be loyal to mine. It is improper to make isolated extracts from passages in a speech. We can quote from Scripture in a like manner, so as to put an entirely erroneous construction on the language used. I deprecate the extracting of a single sentence from a speech in order to illustrate the particular views of any honorable member. In the speech I made I entirely separated the question of the privileges of the House in connection with the appointment of Mr. Wilson, and I defy honorable members to show that, in anything I have said, I connected the two questions in any degree. On the contrary, I hold that they are entirely separate; and if the honorable gentleman has any idea that I am inconsistent he can think so. It has very little influence upon me. I deprecate altogether this class of attack upon honorable members on this side of the House, where there can be no retaliation.

Mr. STOUT.—The honorable member for Wellington City has referred to what took place in Committee. I think he will see that the position he has taken up in reference to this question is a very peculiar one. The tone of his speech is very different from what it was a few nights ago. He said then that there were "gentlemen and gentlemen." He also said that the Ministry of the day had throughout the whole of the proceedings been guilty of laying a transparent trap to catch His Excellency. He also said that if they had been actuated by any honest feeling they would at once have pointed out that His Excellency had made a mistake. But does he mean to say that anything has come out in the later correspondence that is not in the prior correspondence? Why, Sir, the prior correspondence shows what took place between Ministers and His Excellency up to the date of the passing of the resolution by this House. All the memoranda that passed afterwards, and the motion of which the honorable member gave notice, referred to what Ministers had done prior to the presentation of the report of the Committee, and not since. Well, Sir, if the honorable gentleman held the opinion he now holds, why did he not move the vote of censure upon the Ministry when the report came up? Some of the Committee wished to raise that question. I at once voted with them, in order that the whole matter should be discussed; but he voted against the constitutional position being discussed. He did not wish to touch that; and, in his first speeches, did he think Ministers deserved censure for the position they had taken up? No. But what is the position now? In a speech he made a few evenings ago he censured the Ministry strongly. Why? Because they did not advise his Excellency. But what does His Excellency say upon that point? He complains that his Ministers should have advised him so far. In his memorandum of the 27th October the Governor says,— the Government should have considered it necessary to press this appointment upon him, and he can only repeat in a more formal manner what he said yesterday."

"The Governor regrets that, after the opinion expressed by him yesterday to Sir George Grey,

There the Governor complains of the Ministry pressing too much advice upon him. In another part of this memorandum His Excellency says that the Government should advise him further in the matter. Then the Governor says, in effect, that the Government, as his Advisers, are responsible for his acts. Well, it is a peculiar doctrine to say that, if the Governor acts unconstitutionally, the Ministry become responsible for his acts. The time may come when it may be necessary to call upon Her Majesty the Queen to remove the Governor, and it would be a most peculiar constitutional doctrine to say that, in such a case, the Ministry, being responsible for the acts of the Governor, should be removed with him. If the Ministry are responsible for the acts of the Governor, why was His Excellency censured by the House? Why were not his Ministers censured? It is a most peculiar thing to punish a man who is not responsible for his actions. Even a murderer, if he be a lunatic, is not punished, because he is not responsible for his acts. Now, I will refer to the peculiar memorandum which I think the Governor will some day regret having written, for, at any rate, it is not logical. The Governor insists that he cannot give any answer to the address of the House until he has referred the matter to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Does not that raise the whole question? Does the honorable member for Wellington City mean to say that there is anything in this memorandum relating to any other matter than the address of this House? The honorable gentleman goes the length of saying that we cannot punish the Governor without also punishing Ministers. Well, opinions differ. The honorable gentleman begged the House not to consider this question in a party spirit, and he comes down to-night and tells us that he will not proceed with his motion. Why? Simply because he is dictated to by his party leader; he admits in this House that he does not bring on his motion because he has been told not to do so. I should have expected that he would have said this: "I look upon this question as affecting the constitutional rights of the Ministry, of this House, and of the Governor; and I will not be dictated to by the honorable member for Egmont." But, in reality, he now comes down and says, "I have joined this new party, and I will do anything my leader tells me to do." He asks the honorable member for Egmont, "What shall I do? Here is thy servant, ready to do thy bidding." He says this constitutional question is not to be touched. Sir, they have asked us to put this question off, in order that the Governor may send to the Secretary of State an ex parte view of the whole question, and this House is actually placed in such a position that neither its constitutional position nor its privileges can be vindicated, simply because the honorable member for Egmont is strong enough to dictate to the honorable member for Wellington City what he shall do. It seems to me that the honorable member for Egmont is the representative of Wellington in this House, and that, in fact, he represents two constituencies. And then the honorable member for Wellington City talks about party allegiance. But does he mean to say that party allegiance means that a few men shall lead this House, and band themselves together and say, "We will oust the Ministry; we will join a constitutional Opposition; but we shall not do so from any desire to benefit the colony, nor from a wish to have economical administration—all we want to do is to keep the honorable member for Egmont in office"? Sir, that is a humiliating thing to see in this Assembly. You may search through the political history of the world and not find another such case. The honorable member for the Thames has suffered for the colony; and what did those honorable gentlemen who now oppose him do in 1867? Why, they passed unanimously in this House an address eulogizing the conduct of the honorable gentleman in the highest terms, praising him for what he had done, and regretting that the colony was losing his services. And yet this honorable gentleman is to be ostracized at the instance of half a dozen members of this House. The honorable member for Wellington City talks of party allegiance. Was he not against the Government from the beginning of the session? I say that he was the opponent of the late Government long before this private arrangement to ostracize the present Premier was come to. He disagreed with the views of the late Government regarding Native affairs and the Land Bill; and yet he is one of those who say, "We will join the honorable member for Egmont, even though we have condemned him by our votes as being unfit to manage the affairs of the colony; and we will sacrifice the privileges of the House, and the constitutional position of Ministers, and do everything which the honorable member for Egmont tells us to do." There will be another opportunity of dealing with the constitutional part of the question, so I shall not allude to it now. It is a novel thing to say that, the Governor by his action having thrown the weight of his position in the scale of political parties in this House, and having shown that he has a partisan feeling, the present Government should come down and defend him. I say that if we take no notice of this matter we shall establish a dangerous precedent, and the result of it will be that a feeling of opposition will be caused between the Governor and the honorable gentlemen on this side of the House. If the Governor is to say that as soon as a want-of-confidence motion is tabled he is to cease to be advised by his Constitutional Advisers, we shall soon live under a system of despotism, and we shall no longer have any constitutional Government. I have no doubt that, when the feelings of the honorable member for Wellington City and other gentlemen on that side of the House calm down, they will perceive that they have assumed an improper position. I would ask honorable members to throw aside all party bias in considering this question; but it is hopeless—they will not do so. The honorable gentleman has read an extract from Earl Russell, to show that that statesman pointed out the dangers of party government, and no doubt this is one of those evils. One can appeal to the decisions of the House of Commons, one can appeal to the decisions of various colonial Legislatures, to show that all parties have united and said, "Whatever we may do amongst ourselves, we will make a stand to prevent any interference with our privileges." I am glad that the honorable member for Wellington City put the case so plainly as he did to-night, for the country will now see that this is not a question of administration, but that the whole question which has raised this agitation against the present Ministry has simply been founded on party feeling. The people will now see that that is the Alpha and the Omega of it. The House is asked to say that the honorable gentleman who is now Premier is to be ostracized by a lot of men who, compared with him, have done nothing for this colony, their only object being that they may get into power and rule the country as they please. I do not wish to comment on the position which the honorable member for Wellington City has taken up; but I think he will find in a few weeks that he has made a mistake. I have no doubt that his views on that point will change from what they are now. Personally, I have a great regard for him, and his position in his profession is recognized by all the lawyers in New Zealand; but it is a great pity to see a man in his position dictated to as to his political conduct in this House by a gentleman in whom a short time ago he declared he had no confidence. I say it is very much to be regretted. I do not wish to comment harshly on the conduct of the honorable member. I feel sure, when his mind is calm, when the heat of contest is over, he will regret the position he has taken up. I am sure it is an untenable one, and it is also one which no party ties ought to have induced him to take up.

Mr. REES.—The honorable member for Wellington City did me the honor to say that I was hounding down the Constitution by the part I was taking in the House. He also made some complimentary remarks in reference to me. I suppose he did it on this principle: that, if he was unable to defend himself, if his conduct was so inconsistent that every one could see it, that those who ran might read it, the best thing for himself to do was to attempt to blacken the character of others, and to bring them as near as he possibly could to the shade which his own political character had taken. I should like to ask him to point out to this House one single instance when I have hounded down the constitutional rights of the Assembly or people; when I have ever given utterance to a word or cast a single vote in that direction; when I have one week accused a man of all sorts of improper conduct as leader of the Government, and the next week followed him into the lobby; when I have brought forward a motion one week condemning one person, and the next week announcing that the fault should rest on the shoulders of others. I would ask him when I have been guilty of toadying to Judges or Governors, or casting out any petition of rights—the rights of the people; when I have been guilty of any action which could be, by any person within or without this House, construed into an action performed from improper motives. We are safe in this: that those outside this House will gauge the character of those inside; will weigh the conduct of those who have been recently ejected from the Ministerial benches; of those who, when pretending to take the part of one party, were secretly holding communication with the enemy; of those who were determined to cast aside those sentiments of honor which bind men one to another in the House; of those who are like a cork dancing on the waves, or like the feather carried off by the winds; who cannot tell one day what their position will be the next; who may give reasons to-day, but cannot tell what their reasons will be to-morrow. I am very thankful that the honorable gentleman is not with us, as also some other honorable gentlemen, for, whatever we have on this side of the House, we have this: that we are able to trust one another; that, if we have to fight back to back, we are not afraid that those who are behind us will turn round to the enemy and plunge the dagger of the assassin between our shoulders. We are not afraid of that. I am afraid that those on the other side of the House are hardly able to reckon upon their friends. I am afraid that, when it comes to that time when they are absolutely dependent upon the good faith of those in whom they put their trust, that trust will be mislaid, and that they will fall into the mire. Sir, there is one portion of His Excellency's memoranda which seems to be peculiarly applicable to the present case. He says, "The Governor, by the privilege of the House, was not supposed to know what was going on. He had no voice in the House. He was not in any way allowed to explain his conduct, or to produce evidence or precedent in his favour. He could not employ counsel." But, Sir, the honorable member for Wellington City has constituted himself his counsel.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Without fee.

Mr. REES.—The honorable member was the self-constituted counsel for the prosecution, and he immediately goes round and becomes the self-constituted counsel for the defendant, without fee in either case, except that fee spoken of by Goldwin Smith in the article I was alluding to the other night—an article which I would commend to the honorable member's consideration. That article shows how, in all places, there are always about these quasi-royal courts persons who become naturally parasites—who become absolutely toadies in the very worst sense of the term. I would recommend to the honorable gentleman the perusal of that article, in which he may learn a very great deal, and he may see reduced to a theory the practice of some persons with whom he may be acquainted. The honorable gentleman deprecated charges. I think that he always deprecated charges in this House. He gets up and immediately deprecates charges, and, hurrying on one word swiftly on the top of another, and before he has allowed a proper period to intervene between one sentence and another, he immediately begins to make charges against other persons. I must say that I was struck with the remark which has been commented upon by the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout). I allude to the charge made against the honorable member for the Thames (Sir G. Grey). History repeats itself. We have heard in this House the honorable member for Timaru pass a eulogium on the very gentleman whom he was opposing as Premier. We have heard the honorable member for Avon do the same thing; and we have heard to-night the last eulogium, passed by the honorable member for Wellington City, upon the honorable member for the Thames. Just the same as in the old Athenian story, the only possible reason any one of them gives for their opposition to the honorable gentleman is, at least so far as the information given by them to the House is concerned, that the honorable gentleman deserves well of his country. They have heard him spoken well of for years. It is exactly the same reason which animated the Athenian citizens against Aristides which seems to animate honorable gentlemen towards the honorable member for the Thames. It would not be correct to impute motives in this House, but we cannot but remember what has taken place during the last two sessions in relation to gentlemen who were members of this House, and who are now members of it. We remember what took place in regard to the honorable member for the Waikato, who was actually declared not disqualified to sit in the House as a member by reason of a contract entered into for 90,000 acres of land, the only reason for exemption being that the contract was illegal. Gentlemen in that position may have good reason for not wishing to see the present Premier at the head of the Government. They may have reasons which are very weighty reasons, which are very strong indeed. And so you may go on. I have heard a very animated speech—an attack upon the honorable member for the Thames—proceeding from the honorable member for the Taieri. It is a well-known axiom that there is never a man so bitter against others, there is never so much animosity shown and spoken by the mouth of any man, as by that of the man who has been a traitor to those who trusted him. These well-known maxims have come out wonderfully true. When a man has sold himself; when a man professes to act with one party and acts with another secretly in the dark; when an honorable gentleman is meeting with one party and is holding up his hands to see what he can get from another; when he is doing this—when he is casting his principles to the winds absolutely careless of principles, careless of the trust which others have reposed in him, careless of their good name; when he gives up everything that other men hold dear in order to enjoy the sweets of office for a short time; when the Nemesis comes upon him; when he begins to think that he has sacrificed the substance for the shadow, he can only look back with a feeling of shame, and look forward without any hope. There are various motives which animate men. I am glad to say that the people outside this House, the constituents, will be able to understand the motives which actuate honorable members in the votes which are given here. We have heard a great deal about this question not being treated as a party question—that it is not to be treated as a party question. When it was said to me, “Did not all your party vote on the one side?” I said, “Certainly they did.” There is not a single member on this side of the House who is not prepared to go to his constituents upon that vote; but I should like to know how many members upon the other side of the House will defend the vote which they have given in relation to this matter when they are questioned about it on the hustings. That is the true reason why it has been treated as a party question; that is the true position in which to put the matter. The question is, when a man stands up before those who sent him here to represent them, whether he is able to defend and justify the course he has taken; whether, in consideration of the greatness of the principles at stake, principles which involve the whole of our constitutional government, the whole of the constitutional liberty and freedom of the people of New Zealand, men are prepared reasonably to defend the action they have taken when they are called to account, when they are called to give an account of the stewardship committed to them by the people whom they represent. I assert that every honorable member on this side of the House who voted will reasonably expect his constituents to indorse what he has done; and I do not believe that there is a single honorable member on the other side of the House who will expect his constituents to do the same thing in regard to his vote. We have been distinctly told by the honorable member who first deprecated party spirit being introduced into this question—we have been distinctly told by him to-night that he forbore to bring on his motion because he was compelled so to do by the chief of his party. I was slightly amused at the honorable gentleman. He said that honorable gentlemen on this side of the House accused the others of wishing to get back to office. Now, there may be some small solatium in the matter, but it was not right to accuse gentlemen on the other side of wishing to get into office.

Mr. TRAVERS.—It is rather a grave thing to say that the sole motive was to get into office. I deny that altogether.

Mr. REES.—I do not exactly understand the words used. They seem to be placed in a different sense. It was currently rumoured not long ago that the honorable gentleman was engaged in forming Ministry after Ministry, and the only feature common to all the Ministries he planned was that the central star of each succeeding galaxy was the honorable gentleman himself.

Mr. TRAVERS.—That is private history, surely?

Mr. REES.—Private history! It is very illustrious private history, but it is the private history of the representatives of the people, and therefore the history of the people themselves. The honorable gentleman attempts to make and nominates Ministry after Ministry, and desires to be a member of each himself. Surely it would be well that his constituents should know what price to put upon him.

Mr. TRAVERS.—What the honorable member says is perfectly true; but these matters are usually treated as private. If, however, the whole thing is to be declared in the House, I should have an opportunity of making an explanation. As the honorable member has raised the point, I may say that I was constantly invited—fully twenty times in the last few weeks—to take office with the honorable member for the Thames.

Mr. REES.—I did not know that the honorable gentleman had been asked. I do not know whether the honorable member for the Thames asked him.

Mr. TRAVERS.—If the honorable gentleman wishes to know by whom I was asked, I may say I was asked by the honorable gentleman to whom the honorable member for the Thames is now speaking. I should not have stated this, but the honorable member for Auckland City East is now quoting matters which are usually treated as private.

Mr. LARNACH.—I think the honorable member makes a mistake. I have no recollection of asking the honorable member to join the Ministry.

Mr. TRAVERS.—All I can say is that the honorable gentleman came to my office with the honorable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Bunny).

Mr. LARNACH.—That is true; but I never made any proposal to the honorable gentleman.

Mr. REES.—I am sorry I raised this question. I never knew that the honorable gentleman had been asked twenty times within the last few weeks to occupy a seat on the Government benches. I never had any conversation with the honorable gentleman. I only knew that it was matter of public talk that the honorable gentleman was not content to join a Ministry, but must form Ministries himself, in each one of which he was to have been as the central sun round which they would revolve. The honorable gentleman is always telling us that we are under a misapprehension. We are now under a misapprehension about the motion before the House. The honorable gentleman reminds me very much of a story, which, I think, is known to most members of the House, of a Mr. Williams, of the House of Commons, who did not pronounce his words very plainly. He was going into the House one day with Mr. Glynn, a whip of the Government, who said to him, “Would you like to be a Viscount, Mr. Williams?” He immediately rushed into the House, and cried out “Privilege, Mr. Speaker, privilege!” There was a dead silence for a moment, and then he was asked what question of privilege he had to raise. “Sir,” he said, “the Government want to bribe me; they want to make me a Viscount!” The honorable gentleman is the “Viscount,” and I hope he will be known as “Viscount Travers.” It seems remarkable that the honorable gentleman is always under a misapprehension.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I am under none.

Mr. REES.—Under none! Then I must be under a great one, for I have heard the honorable gentleman's statement contradicted.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I heard it myself.

Mr. REES.—I am obliged to the honorable gentleman for his statement. He appealed to me very feelingly, leaning gracefully on the books on the desk before him, saying that this was private talk. All I can say is that I never heard it.

Mr. TRAVERS.—Therefore you should not repeat what you know nothing about.

Mr. REES.—If the honorable gentleman will put himself in a ridiculous position, so that men jeer at his making Ministries and saying, "This position would fit the honorable member for Avon, and this position myself, and this would suit somebody else, and that the honorable member for Nelson"—but always to be there himself—I cannot help it. There is not a member of this House so eaten up with vanity and self-conceit, not to mention the small item of voting one day with one party and another day with another, as the honorable gentleman. If he puts himself in that position, is he to say that these matters are not to be debated? Why, he is making a laughing-stock of himself to the whole country. There is not a penny newspaper in the country in the columns of which, if he looks into them, he will not find dozens of cases of privilege in which he himself is concerned, quite as great as, and far greater than, that of the late Attorney-General against Jones, and likely to give as large an amount of satisfaction to the prosecutor. The position of affairs in New Zealand is tolerably interesting at present. The honorable member for Egmont, the leader of the Opposition, proposed the other day that this resolution should be postponed until half-past seven o'clock this evening—I believe he was the honorable member who moved it—and the first thing he does, when the time has arrived for discussing the question, is to move that it shall be postponed for a week. His followers, including the honorable and learned member for Wellington City and the honorable member for the Taieri, implicitly voted that the question should be taken at half-past seven this evening, and those very gentlemen now vote that it shall be postponed for a week. There is no question in their vote about constitutional law, or the rights and liberties of the people. It is impossible to believe that, in the present aspect of affairs, any question, however great the interests at stake, can be discussed without the purest party spirit being allowed to weigh with the honorable members on that side of the House. I am able to say, too, that the people, who are the ultimate tribunal, take the same view, and possibly they will take some method more forcible than polite towards certain public men in showing their appreciation of their conduct. This is not to be forgotten: that the question at issue is a question that interests all of us equally. I should like to know how His Excellency will thank those honorable gentlemen for putting him in the position in which they have placed him. They are putting His Excellency into a most false and disagreeable position. They are putting him into a position which is not a true one, and which, if they are his friends, they should not allow him to occupy. The first duty which this House owed to His Excellency, as the representative of Her Majesty and a constituent part of the Legislature of New Zealand, was calmly to discuss this question, and to decide it, not in the spirit of party, but fairly and honorably and justly in relation to the whole matter, and, acknowledging, as the House has already done, that His Excellency had inadvertently infringed the privileges of the House, to have said so quietly and without heat. Those honorable gentlemen should have allowed the decision of the House to have been sent Home, to allow not only the Secretary of State to judge, but the public also; for this matter will not rest with the Secretary of State—it will attract a very large amount of public attention in England; and therefore I say that this House should reasonably and calmly come to a decision, and allow the whole matter to go not only before the Secretary of State, but before the discerning people of the Home country. It cannot be supposed that a question of this kind, raised in an important part of England's Colonial Empire, will be allowed to rest quietly in the Colonial Office, particularly now that the Imperial Government are so much interested in all colonial matters. As the honorable member for the Thames has shown, a very great change in that respect has come over the feelings of the Home authorities within the last few years. People at Home are now doing all they can to draw the bonds between the mother-country and her colonies as close as possible. Is it likely, then, that this question will not be discussed in the leading London journals, and in the principal papers throughout the country? Certainly it will. Persons who are well acquainted with the history of England, and especially with its constitutional history—the great masters of constitutional law—will give their opinion upon the whole of this question; and I say that the majority to-night of "one" have actually placed this House in the position of being dumb in relation to its own privileges when the question comes before those people. Sir, those members have committed a wrong against this House, they have committed a wrong against the Government of the colony, they have committed a wrong against the Crown in refusing to allow the House to discuss the matter and come to a decision upon it. What was the reason? Was there a single reason given? We have had really none. We heard a number of sentences from the honorable member for Wellington City. I might say a flood of words came rolling out of his mouth more swiftly than his mind could guide them. He abandoned the helm, and the words came floating out like boats set afloat in a strong wind on a rapid stream by small boys who know not where they are going or what will become of them. The honorable gentleman's oratory is generally of that character. When he begins to speak he does not know where he is going to, and when he sits down he is quite as much astonished at the result as any other honorable member of the House. It is his usual custom to say one thing to-day and another to-morrow, just as he has done in this matter.

The questions here involved are very grave indeed. There are three or four principles contained in the question which are of vital importance to the colony—that is, if the liberties granted by the Constitution are to be regarded as of any value. There is first this:—

“The Governor, however, cannot admit that their responsibility should be so limited, because, if the act of the Governor is such that the Government cannot accept or defend it, it is their duty to resign, in order that the Governor may be able, if he can, to form a Government who would support his views.”

That is not constitutional law. It is not the views of the Governor that have to be maintained. If it be simply this, that the Ministry are to support the views of the Governor, then this House is not the Government at all. It seems to me, according to all constitutional practice, that the Executive is to tender advice until the Governor cannot take it, not till he cannot agree with it; nor yet that the Government are to fall in with the Governor's views. Then we are told that “this question, as to the extent to which Government are responsible to Parliament for the acts of the Governor, is one which cannot possibly be decided in the colony.” Here is a statement that we cannot decide our own matters. This matter is to be allowed to go Home to be settled, while this House is to be rendered dumb by a majority of one. Then there is another exemplification of the remarkable opinions of the Governor: “The Governor has therefore decided to forward the whole case for the consideration and decision of the Secretary of State.” Sir, this House will not yield to any decision—this country, I say, Sir, will not yield to any decision—that is formed by the Secretary for State on such a matter as this. We are ourselves able to come to a decision, and it is only by a decision of this House that the country will be governed. But yet, while we are told that this matter is to go Home, a majority of one in this House has postponed any action on our part in order that the time may go by during which the House might give an expression of opinion before the documents are transmitted Home by the Governor. Then there is another point. We read,—

“In conclusion, the Governor would wish to state that, in reply to a telegram from himself, he has heard from Sir Hercules Robinson that a precedent, which appears very nearly similar, did occur to Lord Belmore, and that his action was approved of by the Secretary of State. The Governor wishes to place no stress upon this information, as he has not been able to find the case, and does not know how far it may be parallel; but it is his intention, if the case has been published, to request Sir Hercules Robinson to furnish him with a copy as soon as possible.”

I think that this colony and the other colonies should be made clearly aware of the position colonial Governors occupy. If they are to be a close oligarchy, a secret tribunal, responsible to nobody, with only a species of authority held over them, and that a wrongful authority, as was shown by the Premier this evening, and irrespective of the countries which they govern, then

I think that the liberties of the people of these colonies are in a very bad state indeed. The House will do well to take into consideration all these matters, and, sinking party considerations, seek to discover what is best for the people, and what will best conserve and enhance the privileges of the people, rather than curtail them. I feel sorry for the vote taken this evening, and I am sure that the whole country will feel sorry for what has been done. I have no doubt what the verdict of the people will be, and what will be remarked at Home—that it is a pity there were to be found in this Assembly a majority so lost to every sense of what was due to the constituencies as to close up the mouth of this Assembly in order that it might not be heard on a matter so vital to its interests as this is. If this matter is to be postponed for a week, it cannot be supposed that there is any chance of a fair and full decision being come to at all. I presume that that is the intention; and it is as well that the House should adjourn and shelve the whole matter, so that it may come forward in a fresh form. I shall not remark upon the motion contemplated by the honorable member for Wellington City, because he seems to have abandoned it. I do not know why—whether he thinks it is not a proper motion, or whether he thinks he could not carry it—but he has postponed it at the bidding of his chief. I regret that the whole question has not been discussed, because I do not think it has been raised in the colonies before. I do not know of any instance later than the American colonies, when they not only declined to allow Secretaries of State to interfere with their deliberations and infringe their powers, but refused to allow the English Parliament to do it. The men in those Assemblies did not close their mouths. No; they risked their lives and their properties to preserve their liberties. Let us suppose that the majority which to-night voted had been in the Assembly, say, of Massachusetts, would the people of America ever have been freed from their burdens? I trust the time is shortly coming when we shall go forth for the decision of the people upon these and other matters which agitate the public mind. I hope we shall be able to appeal to the constituencies, and do away with the personal animosities and dislikes in this House, and get rid of certain parties who are possessed of an insatiable desire to get back into office. The attitude taken up by ex-Ministers since they resigned their seats has been remarkable, with the exception of the case of the honorable member for the Taieri, who has attempted to do some work, and to give time and consideration to business, as well as to give Ministers the benefit of his deliberations. What has the honorable member for Egmont been doing? His occupation has been a series of attempts to write motions of want of confidence in the Government. He consults the ex-Attorney-General, and studies the Standing Orders and May's “Parliamentary Practice”—he will be quite a constitutional lawyer directly—but that is all he does. As for being of any use, why, the Assembly might just as well be without him. He just goes far enough to show that he would bite if he could; but he cannot do that. He has not been able to get his illustrious "No. 3" on yet, and it strikes me he will not be able to get it on for a considerable time yet. Still he goes on earnestly in his work of drawing up notices of motion; and that is all he does. I hope the people of New Zealand will take notice of all that these gentlemen have done since they have been out of office, with the exception of the honorable member for the Taieri. I do not believe they have spoken upon any subject except it has been against the Ministry. I do not believe they have done anything except to support any vote which would retard business and harass the Ministry; and this is the work of representing the people. If they cannot get into office they will do nothing. Sometimes, as the other night, the honorable member goes so far as to say he will stop all business; but he was afraid to carry out that threat. I would not make threats which I had not the courage to carry out. I would not say I would do anything before I was prepared to do it. But he knew that if he attempted to stop the Land Bill he would find boisterous weather among his own party. The country is thoroughly weary of this work. The country desires absolutely either that the present Ministry shall be allowed to finish the work and prorogue the House, or that the House shall be dissolved and that we all shall render an account to our constituents. I am afraid some will not come back. For instance, if report be true, the honorable gentleman opposite will not again represent Wellington City. I hope we shall go to our constituents. Whatever we on this side are afraid of, we are not afraid of meeting our constituents; we are not afraid of that tribunal. We have done what we could to benefit the country, and we are quite ready to go on in our present course without selfishness. We are prepared to do as much as we can, and, if the honorable gentlemen opposite can say that, I have no doubt that they will meet with the same reception from their constituents as we shall from ours. I hope the adjournment will be agreed to, and that this matter will be shelved, so that it may come before us in another form.

Mr. TRAVERS.—I should like to say a word by way of personal explanation. I made it my business, since I spoke, to see Mr. Bunny, who, in the presence of four other gentlemen, quite confirmed my statement.

Mr. LARNACH.—I can only say that on one occasion, in company with Mr. Bunny, I went to see the honorable member; but neither Mr. Bunny nor myself made any proposal as to offering him a place in the Ministry. I do not know of any proposals being made to him on any other occasion.

Mr. SUTTON.—If in the course of a few months we have to face our constituents, I think that the issue will be decided upon a much larger question than this paltry privilege question. The people are sick and tired of it. As to the privileges of the House having been invaded, it is all nonsense, and no one knows that better than the honorable member for Dunedin

City (Mr. Stout). I like consistency. I have heard the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, and the Native Minister, and others declaim in unmeasured tones against referring this matter to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but I find that those honorable gentlemen were the first to suggest a reference to the Secretary of State. That will be seen by enclosure 4, page 8, of A.-5 of the Parliamentary Papers. Honorable members may laugh, but it will be found that the document is dated the 7th November, and that is the earliest date of the services of the Secretary of State being called into requisition. It was the Government, and not the Governor, who suggested the reference to the Secretary of State. I have already stated that this is a very paltry matter to waste time over. I am one of those who do not agree with the action of the Committee. I do not think the matter should have been gone into in the way in which it was gone into, and I find that my opinions are borne out by the papers before the House. The Governor says in No. 3 that the paper was presented to the House solely upon the advice of Sir George Grey. Therefore the Government are solely responsible. I trust the adjournment will be agreed to.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I have no wish to enter into the discussion of the main question at this late hour. I merely wish to correct a statement of the honorable member for Auckland City East, who said that there was no precedent of a Legislature having remonstrated on an analogous subject since the days of the declaration of American independence. I hold in my hand the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in which I find that on the 22nd May, 1874, an analogous question arose about the appointment of members of the Legislative Council. A question was moved, on the motion of Mr. Foster,—

"That this House is of opinion that any attempt on the part of any Governor of this colony or of any Secretary of State in Great Britain, whether by despatches or instructions, or otherwise, to interfere with the appointment of members of the Legislative Council of this colony, or on the part of any Minister of the Crown in this colony to sanction such interference, so as in any way to limit or restrain the power of the Government of this colony in such appointment, or to permanently limit the number of members of such Council, or to confine such number to a fixed standard, is contrary to law, and subversive of the rights and privileges of the Government and Legislature of this colony.

"The House divided—Ayes, 19; noes, 13.

"And so it was resolved in the affirmative."

I wish that this House had an opportunity to vindicate its position in a similar manner previously to the departure of the mail. If the honorable member for Wellington City does move his motion, I should like to move as an amendment a motion embodying the substance of the resolution of the Legislature of New South Wales. The honorable member for Egmont seems determined that the motion of the honorable member for Wellington City shall not come on, and by a majority of one he has been enabled to carry that determination into effect.

Mr. REES.—I did not say that there was no analogous case as to the appointment of a Legislative Councillor and the proceedings consequent upon that. I said that there was no precedent for referring the matter to the Secretary of State.

Mr. JOYCE.—It would be well that the motion for the adjournment should be carried, and the motion disposed of once and for all. The House has already declared that His Excellency has committed a breach of the privileges of the House, and, having done that, the matter was at an end so far. I agree with the honorable member for Wellington City, that the question is now divided into two parts, and I look upon the second part much in this light: French cooks are able to make, out of a very tasteless material—the white of eggs—a compound called omelette soufflée, a dish which has a very substantial appearance, but which is simply froth. The honorable member for Wellington City is an adept at making omelette soufflée. No earthly good can result from pursuing the matter further. If His Excellency the Governor chooses to refer this matter to the Secretary of State for his own gratification, well and good; but the House has already decided what it will do. Unfortunately, when the House decided that His Excellency had committed a breach of its privileges, it did not feel itself in a position to do what it would do in the case of an ordinary citizen. It could not treat him as it treated Mr. Jones. It could not bring him to the bar of the House. The first part of the proceedings was an impeachment of His Excellency's conduct; but there seems to be no precedent which would justify us in inflicting punishment upon His Excellency. The House appears to have been content with having declared His Excellency guilty of a breach of its privileges. It had to stop there, because it had no means of further enforcing its power. His Excellency admits that he has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House; and there that matter must end, unless the House sends Home an address to the Crown for his removal. Possibly that would be an extreme course to pursue, and I think the matter may as well be left at rest. I shall not discuss the main question further than to say that there would have been no necessity for any further interference by this House if His Excellency had not given reasons for refusing to nominate Mr. Wilson to the Legislative Council. These questions of breaches of privilege are troublesome matters to deal with, and the House always has in the end to drop them in some unsatisfactory manner. The least unsatisfactory solution of the question would be to adjourn. The House will have vindicated its privileges so far, that His Excellency is not likely to give it any further trouble, after having received something in the nature of a reprimand.

Mr. REID.—I think this small matter has been very much magnified. I do not think it is so formidable as to threaten the liberties of this Parliament to the extent some speakers on the opposite side seem to imagine. The question has taken two phases. The first is the action of the Ministry in recommending such an appointment, which I think at the particular time was censurable. I think the Ministry the leader of which had been very inquisitive as to whether there were to be any additions to the other branch of the Legislature belonging to a party some of the members of which are of opinion that the constitution of that body is not satisfactory at the present time, and that some alteration should be made in it—I think it was not a proper act on their part to recommend the Government to make an addition to the Legislative Council, especially at a time when a want-of-confidence motion was pending. If it was proper under such circumstances to appoint one member, it would be equally proper to appoint twenty members; but at such a time it was not proper. The next stage is the publication of the correspondence, and in respect to that it cannot be said that the Governor is responsible, seeing that he acted on the recommendation of his Ministers; and to my mind this was the position which Ministers should have taken up: Either they should have been content to waive the question of making the appointment to the other branch of the Legislature, or, if they were not content to waive that appointment, they should, in laying the correspondence on the table, have intimated that they had tendered their resignations, and that they only held office until their successors were appointed. They should have adopted one of those two courses. If there was such a breach as to justify the resignation I believe the Government would have resigned, knowing well that this House would support them. Honorable members may be sceptical upon that point, but I say that, no matter what was the state of party feeling, I, for one, should have supported them if the privileges of this House had been invaded. I am confident that if there had been any serious violation of the privileges of this House on the part of the Governor the Government would have taken up that position; but they did not take either of these courses, and consequently their action up to that point deserves censure. But when it comes to the question whether this Parliament is to determine its own privileges, or whether they are to be determined by the Secretary of State, I say that the Parliament will determine its own privileges, and if any attempt is made to interfere with those privileges the House will rise, I believe, as one man, and resent it. Much has been made of the reference of this matter to the Secretary of State for his decision. I do not understand that to mean that the action of this House is to be fettered in any way. If it does, it will soon be found that the House will not quietly submit. The Secretary of State may instruct the Governor as to what his position is to be in these matters. I am sure, however, that he will not, in giving his opinion, lay down any rule for the guidance of this Parliament. Much has been said—and I must say that I fail to see the force of the argument, coming from the quarter from which it does come—regarding the interference by the Secretary of State with this Parliament. I agree that there should be no interference on the part of the Secretary of State, but I ask the honorable member for Dunedin City, and the other honorable gentlemen who say so much on this point, how they reconcile their present action with the fact that they agitated to send Home a petition to the Secretary of State praying for his interference in relation to the deliberate action of this Assembly on the Abolition question.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That petition was to be sent to the Queen, and not to the Secretary of State.

Mr. REID.—That is a mere quibble. The petition would have gone to the Secretary of State. I understood that at a convention which was held it was decided that the Home Government should be asked to interfere to prevent the decision of this Parliament in regard to the abolition of provinces from being carried into effect.

Mr. STOUT.—No. There were two petitions to be sent Home. One of them prayed for the creation of Otago into a separate colony, and the other for the removal of the seat of Government.

Mr. REID.—The object of the petitions was to get the Home Government to interfere with a decision of this Parliament. I was at the convention, and I was greatly astonished to hear gentlemen, who are now sticklers for the privileges of this House, talking about getting an outside body to interfere with our local affairs. I am glad, however, to perceive that they have now seen the error of their ways, and are prepared to adopt a more constitutional course, by declining to allow any outside body to interfere with the action of this Parliament. The honorable member for Auckland City East has undoubtedly sung the song of the swan to-night. He sang melodiously. He sang to the constituencies the praises of himself and the party to which he belongs, and no doubt many who were not here to hear him will read those praises in the pages of Hansard. They will see how those honorable gentlemen have stood up for the interests of the people, and how ungrateful that people will be if they do not see justice done to them at the forthcoming elections. The honorable gentleman has also expressed his opinion of those who do not see things in the same light as himself. He holds that all such persons should be ostracized from this Parliament, and that their places should be taken by men who would be led by the honorable gentleman and his chief the honorable member for the Thames. I think that it is just possible that the public may have taken the measure of the honorable member, and perhaps they may not have formed so high an opinion of the honorable gentleman as he himself holds. It is possible that they may form a different estimate of him, and that he may not stand so high in their esteem as he imagines he does. I hold that it is our duty to act according to our convictions. We should not allow ourselves to be influenced by apprehensions that what we do will not be thought well of outside this House, and I believe that those who allow themselves to be influenced in that way will find themselves in the wrong. I will not refer to the personal allusions which the honorable gentleman made to me. I am quite content to leave my character and my dealings to be judged by the public. I have served the public for some time, and, if it be that they judge me at the estimate which the honorable gentleman places upon me, I cannot help it, and I shall offer no objection. If the public think it is time for me to retire into private life I am quite ready to do so, and perhaps it would be to my private interest to do so. I endeavour not to make personal allusions regarding any one, and I think it would be wise for all of us to follow that course. The honorable member for Auckland City East has said that I attacked the honorable member for the Thames in a bitter manner. Well, I am not aware that I attacked him; I combated arguments which he had used, and the only portion of my remarks that was not in reply to his arguments was that referring to the constitutional position of the Government in refusing to take the sense of the House as to whether they have a majority or not; and in that I made no personal attack. If I am not as smooth a speaker as the honorable gentleman, I regret it, but I say that I am not actuated by any personal feelings against the honorable member for the Thames or any other member of this House. In fact, I do not allow personal feelings to influence me in this House at all. In conclusion, I will say that I think we have wasted a great deal too much time over this matter. The liberties of the Parliament are not at stake. The Parliament has certain liberties and privileges, and if any attempt were made to interfere with them I think we might safely leave the House to deal with them. If the Government think there is an important constitutional question, involving the freedom and privileges of this Parliament, at stake, and that they have not been treated properly by His Excellency, they should tender their resignations, and, if it were found that they had just cause for complaint, no doubt this House would assist them in maintaining its privileges. Until they take some action of that sort, we cannot think that there has been any infringement of the liberties of this Parliament.

Sir G. GREY.—I should like to make a short explanation. I may say, first, that the honorable member for the Taieri spoke, in the early part of his speech, like a man—nay, more, like a free man—and I was extremely glad to hear him say that this matter should be decided by ourselves. I wish to refer to the inconsistency which he alleged was shown by us in regard to this matter. It is quite true that my friends and myself did propose to appeal to the Crown upon one subject. We hold all our privileges here under an Act of the Imperial Parliament, which gives to the General Assembly certain powers over other Legislatures; and the question was, whether this Assembly was acting beyond its powers and oppressing others—whether, in fact, it was breaking the Act of the Imperial Parliament. To have attempted to have settled that question ourselves must have given rise to serious disputes; but it was a totally different question from the one which has now been raised. The honorable gentleman himself must see that. I do not think there is anything else in the speech to which I need allude. I may say that I make no complaint regarding any observations the honorable gentleman has ever made with respect to myself. I endeavour always to refrain from wounding the feelings of any honorable member, and any remarks the honorable member for the Taieri has made in reference to myself I look upon as if they were in answer to arguments of my own. I shall always listen carefully to any reasons he may give in opposition to my views.

Mr. J. C. BROWN.—I am glad the honorable member for the Taieri considers this a very small matter, and I hope the House will treat the motion of the junior member for Wellington City (Mr. Travers) as one of very small importance. I trust the honorable member for the Taieri will be found voting on this question as if it were a very small one. If it is such a very small question, why should we adjourn it for a week? Why not dispose of it to-night, and proceed to the business of the country? We have been taunted by the ex-Premier for going on with the business of the country while a motion of want of confidence was pending, and now that honorable gentleman desires that we should have two motions of want of confidence before us while the work of the House is going on. Sir, in defiance of the opposition of the ex-Premier, we on this side of the House are determined and will continue to do useful work and bring the session to an early close. We have also heard the honorable member for the Taieri say that, in the action for the liberty of Parliament, the better plan would have been for the Ministry to resign, when he would have defended their position. It is quite clear that the only object of those gentlemen opposite is to get back to the emoluments of office. Anybody who watches the ex-Premier can see that he is ready to grasp at whatever comes in his way. That is evident to any one who has watched the part he has taken in this debate, or on the land question with which he has so unworthily taunted us as trying to keep back. When we were in Committee on the Land Bill a few nights ago, did the honorable gentleman take any part in our deliberations? Was he watching the progress of the Bill? No, Sir; he was studying the Standing Orders, trying to find some loophole to bring through his no-confidence motion; rushing about after the honorable member for Waikato to draft some other motions of want of confidence for him; then taking it round among honorable members, trying to induce them to approve of it and support him. I think, with the honorable member for the Taieri, that this is a very small matter, and the sooner it is disposed of the better. Unless this is at once done the business of the country must be delayed. I shall support the adjournment of the House.

Motion for the adjournment of the House agreed to.

The House adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 13th November, 1877.

Third Reading—Public Reserves Bill—District Railways Bill—Strath Taieri Railway Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

THIRD READING.

Dunedin Loans Bill.

PUBLIC RESERVES BILL.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to vest in local bodies the various reserves throughout the colony, and he hoped that when it was in operation there would be fewer small local Bills than at present coming up to the Council. One of the leading peculiarities of the Bill was that it proposed to allow trusts to be registered in the Land Transfer Office. There was also provision in the Bill under which, if necessary, the General Government might resume possession of any reserves, paying for any buildings that might be upon them. All reserves handed over would be subject to that right, and the increment in value would not be reaped by the local body as against the Crown. The necessity for this Bill was so apparent, and its provisions were so simple, that he made no apology to the Council for saying no more in moving its second reading.

The Hon. Mr. HALL was exceedingly glad to see this Bill introduced. It supplied a very serious public want, and would, he hoped, release a great many reserves, for recreation and other purposes, which were now practically shut up, and could not be dealt with. The passing of this Bill would be a great advantage, but there was one clause in it which he thought was open to serious objection. He referred to clause 13, which provided that the trusts upon which the reserves were granted to Commissioners or other bodies were to be registered in the Land Transfer Office. Now, that was an entire innovation, as he understood it, upon the principle of the Land Transfer Act. The question had been very frequently discussed, in the Council and elsewhere, by persons who took a great interest in the system of land transfer; and by all the best friends of that system the registration of trusts had been pronounced to be exceedingly objectionable. He hoped, therefore, that, either now or at some future time, the Colonial Secretary would favour be prepared to give some strong reasons in of this proposed alteration: if not, he would feel it his duty to oppose that part of the Bill. The measure, as a whole, he took as a very great boon.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said he could not give his consent to the proposal in the Bill for registering trusts. It was a fundamental condition of the Land Transfer Act that trusts should be rigidly excluded. The same principle existed in the inscription of trust stock. The Bank of England would not recognize trusts, neither would the Grand Livre in France. If the Legislature once allowed public bodies to have their trusts registered, it would be unable to resist the pressure which trustees would bring to have private trusts registered. He could not see any reasons for registering public trusts which would not equally be found to affect private trusts, nor did he see why the safeguards which were provided against registration of private trusts under the land-transfer system were not equally applicable against the registration of trusts in the case of public bodies.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said he had specially drawn the attention of honorable gentlemen to the 13th clause, because he was aware that many members had opinions on the subject, and it was not right that it should be introduced without its being pointed out that there was a proposed deviation from the existing practice. But, far from understanding that it was one of the advantages of the Land Transfer Act that trusts should not be recognized, he had always understood that it was the one main objection to that system; that it was a recognized flaw in an otherwise advantageous piece of legislation; and the honorable gentleman, if he took a little pains, would find that, to get over that difficulty, and to remove that objection to the Land Transfer Act, there had been numberless proposals made. The fact of the absence of a provision for the recognition of trusts had been in itself an admitted flaw, opening a door to fraud; and the only justification for it, or the only ground upon which it had ever been defended, was that it was impossible to maintain the extreme simplicity of the land-transfer system compatibly with such a recognition of trusts. The sole reason against a recognition of trusts which had any real weight was that it would involve so much of what, for this purpose, he would call red tape—so much more writing and parchment—as to do away with the simplicity of Torrens's Act. As against the Government, and to the limited extent that the Government would make use of this system, that objection could hardly hold good; it was rather theoretical than practical, the plan never having been fairly tried. The Land Transfer Department made no objection to this proposal. Although it did not absolutely originate with them, still from the very beginning they had been cognizant that it had been suggested, and had declared themselves quite willing to give it effect. He was speaking of the Land Transfer Department of this colony. The Government trusts would probably be exceedingly simple, and the system of registration of trusts might be tried in its least objectionable form. That was the reason for making this provision. It was one as to which honorable gentlemen could exchange ideas in Committee. If they could not agree, of course it must be excised from the Bill. But it was considered to be well worthy of suggestion, and he was desired to say that it was one which the department itself saw no difficulty in carrying out.

Bill read a second time.

DISTRICT RAILWAYS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—I move, That the Bill be read a second time this day week, in order to give the Colonial Secretary an opportunity of speaking again. That something in the direction of this Bill is required I am very strongly of opinion, but whether the Bill as it now stands is such a Bill as the Council should pass is fairly open to question. The Bill allows any company to propose a railway district, and also the classification of lands in that district into divisions which will receive greater or less benefit from the construction of a railway. The votes of the ratepayers are then to be taken upon the question whether a railway shall be made in the district under terms of the Act, and if there is a majority in its favour the railway will be made, and the land in the district will be charged with a rate which will be sufficient to pay 5 per cent. on the cost of the railway for twenty years. That branch railways should be made in parts of the country in which main lines are not likely to be constructed, and that they should be made with the assistance of a guarantee to be collected from rates on the land, is, I think, a reasonable principle; but I ask honorable members to consider whether, as the Bill now stands, it would not place it in the power of persons holding, say, one-tenth of the property in the district to saddle a rate on the remaining nine-tenths. I know districts in which a majority of the ratepayers hold only one-twentieth part of the land in the district. There are a number of small occupiers, upon whom the rate proposed to be levied would be extremely light, and it would be in their power to saddle nineteen-twentieths of the property in the district with a rate, even though the owners of that property objected to the construction of the work. It seems to me that that would be unjust. There ought to be the assent of something like a majority both in number and in value. There are one or two other objections to the Bill. Power is given to the County Councils to undertake the construction of these district railways. Now, if such works are to be undertaken at all by the counties, they ought only to be undertaken after further steps have been adopted than are here provided for for obtaining the consent of the owners of property; otherwise this Bill might be made a means of very great oppression. I shall not vote against the second reading, but I hope we shall hear from the Colonial Secretary that the present Government are willing to introduce considerable modifications in its details.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The chief feature of this Bill, as distinguished from another Bill which has been for some years nominally in operation, is the guarantee proposal. The guarantee, honorable gentlemen who have read the Bill will understand, refers to a guarantee by the Government of 2 per cent., and 5 per cent. by the localities through which the railways will pass. That 5 per cent. is provided by rates. Those rates were not provided in the former Act, because there was no guarantee. Classification for rates is another novel feature in this Bill.

There is also in this Bill a limitation of time allowed to the Government to make up its mind to purchase or not purchase. There are greater facilities than existed in the former Bill for borrowing. A company under this Bill can mortgage the undertaking, its rights as well as its property; while under the old Act that was not allowed. Ratepayers formerly voted on the question only of the permission for a railway to go through a district. Now they will vote as to the merits of the undertaking. With regard to the voting power to which the honorable gentleman has alluded, and to which I drew attention myself in the remarks I before made to the Council, there is a great deal to be said. But we cannot have everything as we would like to have it in this world, and I am almost afraid that we should find it impossible to bring about any very startling innovation. Honorable gentlemen will see, however, that the same vote is allowed under the 14th clause as can be exercised under the county system. I am aware that there are small towns which contain a very large number of errant inhabitants who live in tenements which perhaps they lease for six months only, and who, nevertheless, have a qualification which entirely overbalances the voting power of the part of the district which will be permanently affected by the railways. I would be prepared, at all events, to have a provision inserted in the Bill to the effect that a considerably longer leasehold would be necessary to entitle a voter to exercise his voice in regard to placing a permanent burden on the district in connection with the railway. I hardly see my way to initiating a totally different system of plural voting. I am afraid it would be only a waste of pains to attempt to do so, because we have almost no chance of obtaining the concurrence of the other branch of the Legislature in any such proposal. However, the Government will support a proposal that there must be greater permanence of occupation to entitle a voter to vote for a district railway. At this period of the session I cannot myself undertake to introduce a Bill placing rural townships on another footing, and taking them out of a general voting for county concerns; but I hope to be in a position to do so at some future time. Such a measure would remedy the glaring disproportion which now exists between the voting power of townships not municipalities, and the rest of the districts, which will really have to pay the rates, at all events as regards matters of this kind, which are not to be altered from year to year, but may last to the end of all time. Some amendments in the Bill will be necessary in order to allow a railway, called the Kaitangata Railway Coal Company, to come under its operation. The Company wishes to take advantage of its provisions, and there is no reason why it should not do so. In glancing over the Bill, it will be found that a great portion of it is transcribed from or is based on the provisions of the Public Works Act for taking land, and so on; and there is nothing in the Bill which conflicts with the provisions of that Act. The permission to occupy Crown lands is only a permission to occupy. It is not an absolute gift; it is merely a right to occupy so long as the railway continues to run. Clause 49 contains a provision relating to borrowing, which was absolutely necessary, because it is impossible without it to obtain an overdraft at the bank. Provision is contained in clause 81 by which, to a certain extent, a district will share the profits of the company through the reduction of the rates when the amount of the guarantee is obtained from the profits; and clause 82 provides that those rates are to be collected half-yearly. There are two sorts of companies—companies with guarantees and companies without guarantees; and I hope honorable gentlemen will pay attention to that distinction. Clauses 93 and 94, which were referred to by the Hon. Mr. Hall, will require some verbal amendment, and will also, for the sake of convenience, be placed after clause 89. I should like to hear the views of the Council upon those clauses. They were, if I am not misinformed, inserted in the Bill in its progress through Parliament. Honorable members can correct me if I am wrong in that, but I think they do not necessarily belong to the scheme. They can be removed or allowed to remain without spoiling the scheme in any way. When we come to consider that subject in Committee, I shall point out to what extent the Government would wish to retain any of these miscellaneous provisions. I hope the Bill, after being amended where amendment may seem to be necessary, will be passed by the Council. I believe that it will do a great deal of good in some districts, and I, on behalf of the Government, should certainly not wish to object to any reasonable proposals which may tend to make the Bill beneficial in its operation to all parts of the country.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—It was with much doubt that I made up my mind to support the second reading of this Bill, because I have a strong objection to guaranteed lines of railway. They have been found to be ruinous failures elsewhere. The country is to be saddled with 7 per cent. on the cost of the lines constructed, while the Government could make the lines for 5 per cent. There are several clauses in the Bill which I shall consider it my duty to get expunged in Committee. The 4th clause either means nothing, or it means a great deal too much. I can get no explanation from any one as to how this clause got into the Bill. It contains a provision of a sort which this Council has always objected to—that is, its retrospective action, and it confers certain advantages upon persons who never expected them.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—How?

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—It will bestow advantages upon the Ocean Beach Railway Company which that Company never expected. The Colonial Secretary says the Kaitangata Railway Company is also to be brought under this portion of the Act. That railway was made for the purpose of communicating with a coal mine, and was made through a swamp by certain gentlemen who had land in the swamp. The land has been doubled in value, and they have been well paid for it; and why should these gentlemen, many of them men of considerable wealth, obtain advantages which they never expected to get when they made the line?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—What advantages?

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—A permanent advantage of 2 per cent. Then, as to clause 77, I shall move that it be expunged, because there seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether the land cannot be burdened twice, once as freehold and once as leasehold. Then, as to clauses 94, 95, 96, 97, and 98, they ought all to be struck out. But I particularly object to clause 4. I cannot ascertain how it came into this Bill. Its evident object is to give certain advantages to those who have no right to expect them.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—This is a most important Bill, and one that requires the serious consideration of the Council. We must not only look at what its immediate effect may be: we must look at the effect it is likely to have in years to come. I consider the introduction of such a Bill is an admission by the late Government that their Public Works policy has to a certain extent broken down; otherwise there would be no necessity for this Bill. If so many more lines of railway are desirable I cannot see why they should not be constructed by the Government. From what we know of the system of guaranteed railways, it has, to a certain extent, been a failure. They were carried out in India in the first instance, but were not a success, and the Government were obliged to come in and take them into their own hands. The companies to be formed under the Bill will have to find the means by borrowing, and it is impossible that they will be able to get money under 7 per cent., which is the amount of guarantee given. I am quite at a loss to understand why 7 per cent. per annum should be incurred in making these railways, when, if the Government take them into their own hands, as they ought to do, they will be able to borrow the money at 5 per cent. In this case, there will be a clear loss to the country of 2 per cent. In the first year, if this Bill were taken advantage of by private companies to the extent of one million, that would at once be a loss of £20,000 a year to the country. Then those lines, if made, will entail an annual cost of 5 per cent. to property, if not paying. I would ask if that is fair, because we have lines made already through which properties have been benefited to a large extent, and which are not taxed in any way, and, of course, if one part of the colony is to be taxed in order to pay for the railways, I do not see why they should not be taxed also. There was a Railway Companies Act passed in 1875, which is incorporated in this Bill; and one line, the Kaitangata, was constructed under it. I saw a report of the working of that line a short time ago, and I understand that it has not been at all successful, and the Government were blamed for it. There are many clauses in the Bill which will require amendment. Clause 14, for instance, is not sufficiently distinct. It does not fix the rate for one year. The rate may be levied for all time, and, if the clause remains in its present form, great injustice may be done. For instance, it may operate in this way: Persons holding miners' rights have a vote, and five men, each with one acre, have five votes; whereas the owner of, say, 5,000 or 20,000 acres would only have five votes. So that a very small proportion of the votes in a district will completely out-vote the large holders of property. I do not see how that clause can be made to work fairly unless it is altered in such a way that there shall be a majority in value of the holders of property as well as a majority of voters. Clause 66 gives the Government no control over the rates of carriage—all the Government has to do is to fix a maximum; but while the companies get a guarantee of 7 per cent. it is not likely that they will charge up to the maximum allowed. The rates of carriage will always be kept as low as possible. In clause 67 power is given to reduce the rate, but I do not think that such a clause will be necessary. Clause 76 provides for a guarantee of 7 per cent., which means that property is to be charged 5 per cent. and the Government is to contribute 2 per cent. I think that this clause should be altered so that the Government guarantee should cease at the end of a certain number of years. Clause 81 is an extraordinary one. Honorable members will see that five years from the opening of the railway no less than 20 per cent. of the earnings is to be regarded as profit derived from the working of the line. That is really an acknowledgment that the Government have very little faith in the management. In clause 83, by which interest to the extent of 2 per cent. is guaranteed, I think the term should be fixed at not longer than seven years. Clauses 94 to 98 were not in the original Bill, I believe, and they give powers to the counties. These clauses require very serious consideration, and I hope they will be struck out. Powers are proposed to be given to the counties which would not have been given to the provinces previous to abolition. I think, if the counties are to be of any use at all, they have quite enough to do with other matters without interfering with railways.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I was much disappointed by the statement of the honorable and gallant member that he had not made up his mind as to what course would be taken by the Government in reference to the County Council clauses in this Bill. I do not think that any one who has looked at the matter fairly can deny this: that the Bill as originally introduced by the late Government in the other House had a clear and specific plan of its own; but the insertion of these clauses giving the County Councils power to construct railways could only have been agreed to in a great hurry, because they strike at the root of all the advantage of the original Bill. Let the Council consider what was the original intention of the Bill. The argument of the framers of the Bill was this: There are districts in many parts of the colony which require railways to be made, but these districts are remote from the main lines, and there are other grounds of public policy why we cannot construct these railways, the chief one being that we have no money to make them; but, not being able to make these railways ourselves, we will afford the means of making them by private enterprise. This was what the Government really said: "We cannot make these railways for you—Parliament will not grant us money to make them; if you want them you must go to private enterprise, and you must show capitalists that the railways, if made, would pay; and, in order to make that clear to the capitalist, you must consent to rate yourselves, if necessary." That was the original position taken up, and I conceive that it was a very proper one, because the ratepayers in the district were obliged to show a safe basis to work upon, and would give good reasons why private enterprise could be profitably resorted to. But that is all changed now, if the County Councils are to be empowered to make railways, and the necessary check on a district is quite removed. The ratepayers in a county would not be under the same sense of responsibility in giving their votes when the County Council was responsible for the railway as they would be if they knew that they themselves would be directly responsible to the private company. They would know very well that they were risking no money of their own, and that if the railway did not pay they would not have to pay interest on the cost. It seems to me that if the Government wish to preserve the leading principles of this Bill—the principles which first recommended the measure—they must strike out these county clauses altogether. Instead of encouraging enterprise, the Bill, if these clauses are retained, will discourage private enterprise, besides imposing on the County Councils responsibilities and powers they were really not capable of assuming. It will only lead to the same recklessness in rushing into public works which, to my mind, has proved to be disastrous in the past, and which has landed us in our present serious financial difficulty. The counties are to have endowments of land, and may issue debentures and raise money on the security of the endowments. It is true that there is a provision that, if Parliament does not pass a resolution at its next session approving of the endowments, they are to cease. But what guarantee have we that that will be any real check upon the action of the Executive Government? Suppose an endowment were made, there is nothing to prevent the grant being issued and money borrowed on the land; and, when the next session came round and there was any objection to the endowment, what would be the answer? That the Crown grant had been issued; and there would be an end of it. Looking at the railway proposals which have already passed the other House, and the proposals which have been made for enormous reservations of land, we ought to take great care lest we encourage the recklessness I have been speaking of, especially in times of political excitement. I hope the Council will revert to the original proposals of the Bill, and that we shall be content with a measure which will encourage private enterprise to make railways in those outlying districts where Parliament cannot find money to make them. Above all, let us strike out of the Bill anything which may tend to impair the purity of political action so desirable on the part of the Government of the day. I am quite sure that if these powers are given to the counties we shall find they cannot properly do the work, and the end of it will be to add very largely to the already heavy burdens upon the State. With regard to the voting power and the rating power, I am not at all afraid if the Bill is confined to private companies and enterprise: then there would be a guarantee that rating would not be resorted to in a reckless way; whereas, without the safeguard of responsibility by capitalists having something to lose, there would be no security against unjust and improvident rates.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—Sir, this Bill has been received with more favour than any other Bill of the session. I believe that throughout the country the people generally entertain the idea that it is a good Bill, and that it will meet a felt want, more especially as regards short lines of railway to connect with the main lines, and to open up rural districts in the colony. If such an object be attained, there will be an advantage to both parties: there will be an advantage to those who have their capital profitably invested, and the country will be benefited because of the increased profit upon the main lines. It is not to be expected that the Government can undertake to make railways in all the localities that want them, especially branch lines. I therefore think the Bill is a good one. Still, there were many objections to it when it was first introduced to the other branch of the Legislature; but changes have been made which have altered the character of the measure, and to a very large extent have improved it. But even now it is not free from objection. For instance, there are too many proceedings to be taken under the Bill before the 2 per cent. guarantee can be claimed from the Government. The sanction of the ratepayers to pay the 5 per cent. interest would have to be obtained first of all; but I do not see that any further proceeding should be taken until both Houses had given their sanction to the company and had agreed to pay the 2 per cent. interest. It is quite possible that, after all had been done in accordance with the provisions of the measure, still Parliament might refuse to sanction the line; and then in what position would the company be? It would be deprived of this bonus, and would consequently be under a very great disadvantage. After fully considering the matter, I think a very great improvement could be made in this Bill by making it imperative that any company formed under the Bill should have a bond fide paid-up capital of 25 per cent., and that the Government should then step in and guarantee debentures for the remaining 75 per cent. The money could be obtained on precisely the same terms as those on which the Government of the colony obtain their money—namely, at an interest of 5 per cent. per annum—thus saving 2 per cent. And, when the Government came to take over the railway, as they have power to do under the Bill, there would be no difficulty in the matter, and the debentures, bearing the ordinary rate of interest, could be taken over by the Government. That would be a great boon to any company, because there would be an undoubted saving to the company of 2 per cent., and it would facilitate the taking over by the Government of the railway afterwards. It is proposed that counties making railways under this Bill shall have borrowing powers. I consider that it would be a great drawback to give them borrowing powers, and that it would lead to a great many mistakes in regard to those parties outside the colony who lend money. Home capitalists would fail to see the difference between the colony and the county, the one being an integral part of the other. There is another point with regard to lending. The debentures are to be for seven years. Now, if we make the debentures current for so short a period the borrower will suffer. The shortest period for which debentures should be issued should be twenty-one years. There is yet another question which we ought to consider in dealing with this subject, and that is, granting concessions of land instead of the bonus of 2 per cent. per annum. In America the State usually concedes one-half of the land on each side of the line, and then the price of the remaining land is doubled, and the result is that the railway actually costs the Government nothing, while at the same time the country is thoroughly opened up. With regard to the question of purchasing the lines, I consider it scarcely fair to the company to say that their lines shall be purchased on the terms indicated in this Bill, which says that the Government shall pay the original cost with 10 per cent. added, and then make a deduction for depreciation. Supposing a line has run for three or four years, the depreciation will amount to more than the addition of 10 per cent., and then, if the company has not made a profit in working the line up to that time, there will be an absolute loss if it has to sell it. The fair way would be to take the line at a valuation at the time it was disposed of, without reference to what it had cost. There is still another question in connection with this subject which I wish to bring under the notice of the Council, and that is that where a line runs through Government land the land is to be rated, but the amount of the rate is allowed to accumulate. It is not stated, however, whether interest is to be charged upon the amount or not. Supposing that the line ran through Government land for most of its length, and that the subsidy which the Government are to pay did not come in regularly year by year, it is quite possible that the railway company might be ruined, while, at the same time, it had a debt against the colony. There should be some alteration in the Bill so that any company running a railway through Crown lands should in some way be enabled to get payment of the 5 per cent. every year, or, if not, that the rate should be allowed to accumulate at compound interest, so that the company should sustain no loss. These are the only items of the Bill that I think require to be referred to by me. Taking the Bill altogether, I think it is an excellent measure. I believe that there are several districts which are prepared to take advantage of the Bill when it has been passed, more especially in regard to the construction of short lines to open up agricultural districts. I think that the best proof that the Bill is required is that the people are prepared to tax themselves for a portion of the cost of the railways. I have much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. Hall's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

STRATH TAIERI RAILWAY BILL.

The Hon. Mr. HALL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it might seem strange to honorable members that, not being connected himself with the Province of Otago, he should have taken charge of this Bill. But the truth was that, although the Bill involved a principle which a large number of members from that part of the colony were favourable to, yet, as the application of that principle might be made in different ways affecting variously different parts of the province, the Otago members, although agreed as to the desirability of forming a line to the central part of the province, might find some difficulty in agreeing as to which way the line should go. It was thought, therefore, that a person altogether independent of Otago might, under those circumstances, be the best person to take charge of this Bill. He was glad to do so for this reason: that he was pleased with the opportunity of showing that the principle embodied in this Bill, and which he had advocated more than once in the Council, was a principle which he was quite ready to apply unselfishly. He did not advocate that principle because it affected the part of the country with which he was connected, but it was one which he would be glad to see applied to every part of New Zealand in which circumstances admitted of it. It was the sound principle of colonial political economy that the waste lands of the colony should furnish the means for developing those lands—for promoting the beneficial occupation of the land—either by the importation of labour, or by providing convenient access by roads, bridges, railways, or harbours, as the case might be. That was the principle which was advocated by the father of New Zealand colonization, Edward Gibbon Wakefield; that was the principle on which he justified the charging of a sufficient price for land in order to enable the land to be beneficially occupied. That was the principle at the root of this Bill, and practically at the root of all successful modern colonization. In New Zealand that principle had been acted upon more or less during the time the waste lands were at the disposal of Provincial Governments. They had, more or less wisely, devoted the proceeds of the waste lands to opening up their provinces; and it was the principle embodied in the Public Works policy introduced by Sir Julius Vogel in 1870. Honorable members would recollect that, although borrowing money to carry out railway works was perhaps the leading feature of that scheme, another feature and, to his mind, the best feature of the scheme was, that considerable tracts of Crown lands were to be set apart to provide funds for the construction of railways, and were to form, in fact, a railway estate. He regretted exceedingly that circumstances had led to that feature of the scheme being abandoned, and that Sir Julius Vogel was not firm in adhering to it. No doubt the political difficulties in carrying it out would have been great, but he believed that it would have added to that gentleman's reputation, and would have materially promoted the prosperity of the colony, if he had adhered to that principle at all hazards. The position in which they found themselves at the present time was that the colony was burdened with an extremely heavy debt, the burden of which was becoming alarming. They had a certain amount of railways constructed, some of which were paying, some of which were not paying interest. A large proportion of those railways he believed would be reproductive, and some of them had already contributed very largely to the development of the material prosperity of the colony. But, as the French say, l'appetit vient en mangeant. The railways they had got gave them an appetite for more. When railways had developed and facilitated the occupation of certain portions of the colony, other portions, seeing such results, naturally demanded the same benefits. They had already, and would have from time to time, demands for railway extension which, under the circumstances of the colony, it would not be possible for them, even if it were wise, to resist. Additional railways they must have, and the only question before them was, How should they provide them? Should they make them by adding still further to the heavy debt pressing on the colony and alarming many honorable members; or should they seek to secure them by applying a certain portion of the waste lands of the colony to their construction? That was the question which presented itself to his mind. Of course the latter plan could not possibly be adopted in every case, but he had no doubt that, where such a course could be prudently and advantageously taken, it ought to be taken? It was a sound and right principle that they should make the land make the railways. He would refer to one objection to this mode of procedure which had been raised before in the Council, and which would probably be raised again—namely, that they were thus getting rid of colonial assets, and were to a certain extent endangering the rights of the public creditor. He did not think the public creditor would say anything of the kind. He lent his money not upon the security of the landed estate of the colony, because he knew very well that they were selling it from year to year, from month to month, and from day to day. There was no breach of faith with the public creditor in doing that. What he had lent his money upon was the security of the tax-paying power of the colony—the general wealth and resources of the colony—the power of the people of the colony to pay, by way of taxation or otherwise, the interest and principal of his loan. That was what the moneyed men in England looked to. Therefore they were doing no injustice in disposing of the land. It was altogether a fallacy to say that it was any kind of injustice to the public creditor. But then it was said, "Even if we are not doing that, we may land ourselves in a difficulty by getting rid of the public estate." Of course if they got rid of it too suddenly, if they got rid of it without creating an equivalent, they would be putting themselves in a difficulty. But what did this Bill propose to do? It proposed to apply 400,000 acres of land in the Provincial District of Otago to the construction of a railway from Dunedin to the centre of the province. Was 400,000 acres a dangerous proportion of the remaining Crown lands of the Province of Otago to apply to such a purpose? The amount of Crown land there occupied under pastoral leases, according to the last return laid on the table of the Council, was considerably over 6,000,000 acres. It appeared to him that they were not taking too large a proportion of this land. But he would go further, and say that, if the land were wisely selected, if it could be shown to the Council that this railway would very largely develop the agricultural land through which it ran, if it would make land now worth £1 an acre worth £3 or £4 an acre, then he contended that, so far from diminishing the available resources of the colony, they would, by such a proceeding, be largely increasing them. That was a wise and prudent policy. Honorable members might, however, object on another ground, and say, "We have a certain sum of money to be provided out of the Land Fund for certain public purposes: how are you going to do that, if you act upon this principle?" His answer was that, in regard to the Province of Otago, the sums realized by the sales of waste lands had not, up to the present time, been excessive; and if they took 400,000 acres out of 6,000,000 acres, and disposed of a portion of the purely pastoral land at such prices as purchasers could afford to pay for it, they would, for many years to come, have as large a revenue as they had at the present time. He did not wish the Government to act hastily or imprudently. While they should, in disposing of agricultural land, exercise the greatest possible care to dispose of it only in such a way as to secure its beneficial occupation by agricultural settlers, absolutely pastoral land might be advantageously disposed of in blocks of considerable size. Every man knew that there were large quantities of land in New Zealand which could never be anything else than purely pastoral. It was true that in some cases agricultural land might have been sold as pastoral land; but there was land which was good for nothing but depasturing, and it would be in the interests of the country to dispose of such land at such terms as a person could afford to pay for it. By adopting that course they would have an ample land revenue for years to come, and eventually the income from the railways would provide a return for the money that had been expended upon their construction. Of course in any proposal of this kind it was the duty of the Council to see that it was not a mere speculative proposal. They should take care that the proposal was a bond fide one, that it was prudent, that the railway could be made at a reasonable cost, that it would assist to develop the settlement of the country, that it would really lead to the cultivation of agricultural districts, and so increase the wealth of the country, and its power to bear public burdens. He would not ask the Council to favour a proposal of this kind if he were not in a position to place before it very ample data upon the subject. The proposal in the Bill was to make a railway to the interior of the Province of Otago. The case had been reported upon by Mr. Blair, District Engineer of Otago, by order of the Government, who instructed that gentleman to consider the whole of the proposed lines through the interior, and to report upon the subject: that report would be found attached to the Public Works Statement, which had been in the hands of honorable members for some time. Furthermore, a Committee of the other branch of the Legislature appointed to consider this question went into it very carefully, took evidence upon the subject from Mr. Donald Reid, from the Surveyor-General (Mr. Thomson), from the Assistant Surveyor-General, who was formerly the Reconnoitring Surveyor of the Province of Otago, from Mr. Roberts, a settler in the neighbourhood, and from his honorable friend Sir Francis Dillon Bell. Upon that evidence, the Committee furnished a report the purport of which was that the most advantageous line of the whole seven which were proposed was that by Strath Taieri to Clyde. The various routes were, commencing from the South—Kingston to Cromwell via Frankton, Waipahi to Cromwell via Teviot, Lawrence to Cromwell via Clutha Valley, North Taieri to Cromwell via Strath Taieri, Palmerston to Cromwell via Macrae's, Palmerston to Cromwell via Shag Valley, Oamaru to Cromwell via Maerewhenua Pass. After considering these various routes, the real contest was between the Strath Taieri to Clyde line and the line from Palmerston by Shag Valley to Clyde. He would trouble the Council with a few extracts from the report of Mr. Blair, and from the report of the Committee, to show why the preference was given to the line now proposed, to show the cost at which the railway could be made, and to show, also, the amount of agricultural land which it would bring into cultivation. The distances of the various lines were all stated in the report of Mr. Blair. The distance of that by way of Strath Taieri and the Maniototo Plain was 122 miles; the distance was 129 miles altogether, but it would join the main line seven miles out of Dunedin. The distance to be constructed via Cromwell and Shag Valley was 107 miles, but it would be 148 miles from Dunedin, as it would join the northern line at Palmerston. There was rather less work to be done in the latter case; but it was a longer line to travel. With reference to these lines, Mr. Blair, on page 67 of his report, says,—

"Having discussed in detail the various routes proposed, I shall now recapitulate and compare their leading characteristics. Route No. 1, via Kingston and the Kawarau Valley, is easy to construct, and its curves and gradients will be easy, but it does not open up good country. It will, however, be useful as a junction when the railway system of Otago is more complete. Route No. 2, via Waipahi, Tapanui, and Teviot, is tolerably easy to make and work, but, beyond the first sixteen or eighteen miles, through which a branch is much needed, there is little good country for settlement. Route No. 3, via Lawrence and Clutha Valley, is the shortest to construct, but it will be somewhat expensive to make, and there is little or no good land opened up by the way. Route No. 4, via Strath Taieri, is the shortest from Dunedin to Cromwell; its gradients are easy, and it brings all the interior plains into direct communication with the capital and the best harbour. Route No. 5, via Palmerston and Macrae's, lengthens the distance to the interior by thirty-seven miles, and adds 1,000 feet to the height, without opening up much available land. Route No. 6, via Palmerston and Shag Valley, misses the rich agricultural land of Strath Taieri altogether. In getting to the Maniototo Plain, it has to go through country 1,500 feet higher than on No. 4. It has severe gradients and curves, and exceptionally heavy works. There is, however, room for a branch to the head of Shag Valley. Route No. 7, via Maerewhenua, misses Strath Taieri and does not open up other good country in its place. A height of 1,200 feet is uselessly ascended in getting to the Maniototo Plain, and the works are heavier than on any of the other routes; it also lengthens the journey from the interior to Dunedin by seventy-two miles. Although I have no hesitation in placing the Strath Taieri route first and the Maerewhenua one last, or near the last, in order of usefulness, these are the two between which the greatest contrast exists."

Mr. Blair, on page 65, also says,—

"After fully considering the question in all its bearings, as laid down at the outset, I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, Route No. 4 is infinitely superior to any other of the seven hitherto proposed; and, further, that it is the best course for a railway that can be got between Cromwell and the seaboard."

Then, on page 68, he says,—

"In conclusion, if it is the intention of the Government to take steps towards constructing a railway into the interior of Otago, I have no hesitation in recommending the Strath Taieri line as emphatically the shortest and easiest route that will in its course open up the most good country for settlement."

In his evidence before the Committee, Mr. Donald Reid said,—

"Clearly the line by Strath Taieri is the line that will do the greatest good to the interior of the province; it will open up the greatest area of land for settlement, as well as meet the requirements, in my estimation, of the interior districts: it will bring them in direct communication with the chief seaport."

He would call one more witness, to whose evidence he was sure the Council would attach great weight, and that was his honorable friend Sir Francis Dillon Bell, who, in answer to a question by Mr. McLean, said,—

"I am obliged to say that, looking to the evidence which Mr. Blair's report gives as to the character of the gradients and the altitude to surmount in the line by Strath Taieri, I should say that, in an engineering point of view, there would be no comparison between that and the Shag Valley line; the Strath Taieri line would certainly be best."

He (Mr. Hall) was now speaking only of the engineering advantages of the different routes. Then Mr. McKerrow also gives evidence upon the subject, and to him this question was put:—

"There is another line which starts also from Palmerston up the Shag Valley. What is your opinion of that line?—My opinion is that the engineering difficulties would be so great that it should also be set aside. I may say that, with regard to this Shag Valley, I think it a proper thing that a branch railway should be made to Luk's, near Sir F. Dillon Bell's station."

So much with regard to the engineering advantages of the various line. Then he had before him estimates of cost—one by Mr. Blair, which was as follows:—

"As already stated, I cannot, without a more detailed survey, give anything like a trustworthy estimate of the cost of a railway from Dunedin to Cromwell via Strath Taieri; but the following, which does not include engineering nor rolling-stock, may be taken as at least an indication:—

	Miles.	£
"North Taieri to Blair Taieri...	34	230,000
Blair Taieri to Maniototo
Plain, opposite Naseby ...	33	140,000
Maniototo Plain to Clyde ...	42	170,000
Clyde to Cromwell ...	13	60,000

Total Dunedin to Cromwell 122 600,000"

There was also the evidence of Mr. Roberts, a settler in the neighbourhood, and, although this was not professional evidence upon the point, it bore very strongly upon it. This question and answer appeared in his evidence:—

"You consider that a company would make this line if a guarantee be given?—I think, for a guarantee of 300,000 acres, a company would be inclined to make a line from near Mr. Reid's corner, or the Chain Hills tunnel, at the junction of the main south line, to Clyde or Cromwell."

Then, question 184,—

"Do you think a public company could be formed to construct this line of railway?—From evidence I have gathered in Dunedin there would be no difficulty in getting a company to construct a line, if given a pre-emptive right over 300,000 acres at 20s. per acre."

That was only the opinion of a layman, and must merely be regarded as confirmatory of what had been stated by Mr. Blair. But the most important part of the question to his mind was this: What amount of land would this line render available—what would the line do in the way of promoting settlement if it were constructed? Upon that point he would trouble the Council with a few quotations. Mr. Reid, in his evidence before the Committee, went into the matter at considerable length—at such length that he (Mr. Hall) would not read the whole of that gentleman's evidence, but would merely say that it was very favourable. Then Mr. Thomson, the Surveyor-General, who knew thoroughly the country, gave this information. After stating how much agricultural land there was, this question was put to him: "And millions of acres of pastoral country?" to which he replied, "Six or seven millions." Mr. McKerrow gives more precise evidence with regard to the agricultural part. He says, at page 8,—

"Now, what would you say was the total area of land available for agricultural settlement, from North Taieri up to Clyde, that would be rendered accessible by the construction of such a line?—There will be 1,200,000 acres opened up.

"Agricultural?—Oh, no; mixed.

"How much would be rendered accessible for agricultural settlement?—I did not consider that point, but I think I might say a fourth of it, or perhaps a third. We do not know what will grow there, because at one time they thought wheat would not grow beyond Taieri; then we shifted to Clutha; then to Queenstown, which is now one of the finest wheat-growing districts in the colony.

"Your answer is that it would render available 1,200,000 acres?—Yes. Of that 1,200,000 acres the whole is Crown land, with the exception of about 40,000 acres; which is a very important point."

That is what he (Mr. Hall) wished to impress upon the Council—that it was an important fact that the whole of the country through which the line would pass, with a trifling exception, was Crown land, and, if managed properly, the construction of the line must result in a large sum of money being placed in the Public Treasury. Mr. McKerrow then went on to say,—

"Supposing now that you were asked to indicate what would be the best line to open up into the interior of Otago, which would you recommend, knowing the country as you do?—I will qualify the reply a little. The Strath Taieri route would open up the most country suitable or available for settlement; but, in my opinion, the best interior line to reach Clyde and the districts beyond, inclusive of ultimate extension to the West Coast, is the railway line via Lawrence.

"That would be because it is the shortest?—And because it goes over the lowest country. If looking at it in a selfish light, and I resided at Cromwell, I would say the line should go that way.

"At the same time, the Strath Taieri is the line that will open up most country for settlement?—Certainly."

Then he came to the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, who said, in answer to a question,—

"I think there is no doubt whatever that there is more available agricultural land open for settlement by the Strath Taieri than by the Shag Valley route; but I doubt whether there is any land on the Strath Taieri route so good in quality as some 4,000 or 5,000 acres by the other line, between my station and Morrison's. The character of the land there is excellent; it is very rich soil, though it is all hilly and ridgy land. As regards land fit for settlement, there is no comparison between the quantity in the Strath Taieri line and the quantity in Shag Valley, though I think there are 5,000 acres in the Shag Valley line better than any I know on the Strath Taieri. I speak of the character of the soil; as regards adaptability for settlement, I still think the Strath Taieri line is the best."

In answer to another question, he said,—

"As I said before, the advantage which the Strath Taieri line has is that along that line there is more available country adapted for settlement by people of moderate capital; while the advantage of the Shag Valley line is that it would be immediately productive of revenue over every ten miles that were made of it, which the Strath Taieri line would not."

Then we find the following:—

"Mr. Macandrew.] Do I understand you to state, from your knowledge of the interior of Otago, that, of all the proposed routes now indicated, that by Strath Taieri opens up the largest area of available country for settlement?—I have no doubt of it."

Another point is brought out in the following question and answer:—

"Do you consider the immediate realization of funds, say for a year or two years, would counter-balance the other disadvantages?—No, I would not say so; I should say that, if you could afford to wait for the receipt of revenue, it would be better to take that line which would open the greatest quantity of land for settlement."

In addition to the testimony he had read, he might read petitions from the various County Councils along the line of route, and one also from the City of Dunedin. But he would not do so. They were attached to the papers, and honorable members might peruse them and observe the unanimity which prevailed in regard to this line. It would be seen, therefore, that this line would open up a large quantity of agricultural land, estimated at not less than 400,000 acres, which, it was stated in the reports he had referred to, was at present comparatively inaccessible—that was to say, that the transport of agricultural produce from that land to a port of shipment was at present so expensive that it would not pay to grow corn in these districts. That was the gist of the whole thing. The foundation of the prosperity of this colony for many years to come must rest chiefly upon its agriculture. Farming was the backbone of the colony, and as farms receded from the port of shipment it became increasingly difficult to carry on agricultural pursuits at a profit unless railway communication were instituted. Honorable members who came from Canterbury knew that very well. They would know that a few years ago it was becoming difficult for agriculturists to carry on their operations at a profit, and that since the railways had been constructed there had been a very great advance in that respect, and that consequently the province had gone ahead. There was no reason why it should not be the same in other parts of the colony. In the district now in question there were 300,000 or 400,000 acres of agricultural land to be opened up. It must be considered, also, that nearly all the land through which the proposed railway would pass was Crown land, and that any increase in its value went into the public chest. It did not pay in these districts at present to grow corn for exportation; but, if the land were made accessible by this railway, people would be able to grow grain on it at a profit, and the value of the land would be increased twofold or threefold. He would now draw attention to the manner in which the Bill proposed to deal with the case. It was proposed that the Government should make reserves in the Counties of Taieri, Maniototo, and Vincent to an extent not exceeding 400,000 acres, and that the Minister for Public Works might construct or cause to be constructed the line proposed to be made. Then the Bill went on to say that, if the Government did not, within twelve months, do the work, a railway trust should be constituted, consisting of the Chairmen of the three counties, upon whom should devolve the power of making the railway. It had been pointed out by gentlemen who took an interest in this Bill that it would be inexpedient to place such power in the hands of such a body, and he was bound to say that, in considering the matter fully, he could not dissent from that conclusion. It was too much power to give them; it was not altogether proper to allow these gentlemen to disburse the proceeds of the sale of 400,000 acres of land or to borrow half a million of money on the security of that land. It was a power which ought not to be given to such a body, and there was no sufficient reason why, if the thing could be done—if the railway were to be constructed out of these large reserves—it should not be done by the Government, who were responsible to Parliament. If the Council, therefore, thought fit to read the Bill a second time, he should consent to the excision of this part of it. Perhaps it would be most convenient, if the Council allowed the Bill to be read a second time, that, with a view to introducing amendments which might be necessary, it should be referred to a Select Committee. It had been suggested that there might be other Bills of the same kind, and that they ought to be referred to the Select Committee also. To his mind that was a fair proposition, but he did not think that that at all interfered with the propriety of this Bill being referred at once to the Select Committee. He thought himself that the Bill ought to include power to raise money upon the security of this land by whoever was intrusted with the duty of making the line, because if the 400,000 acres was now worth £1 per acre—and honorable gentlemen from Otago assured him that it was so—it would be worth much more if the railway were carried through, and the land were made accessible to the shipping port of the district. No doubt there would be a very large increase in the value of the land; and he was assured, by some persons likely to be well informed on the point, that the increase in value would absolutely be equal to the whole cost of the construction of the railway, so that it would be sufficient to pay for the construction of the line, and there would be a surplus equal to the present value of the land after the line was finished. One witness before the Select Committee of the other House, Mr. Roberts, stated as follows in his evidence: He was asked the question, "What would be the value of the land?" to which he replied, "The value of the land would be increased perhaps from 5s. to 7s. 6d. per acre. The price of agricultural land would be enhanced from £1 to £1 10s. per acre beyond the present upset price." That was to say, instead of selling the land at £1 per acre, it could be sold for £2 or £2 10s. per acre; and he felt certain that that was by no means an extravagant estimate. It was a well-known fact that when a railway was made through land it generally became worth four or five times its former value. Mr. McKerrow gave somewhat similar evidence on the same subject. He was asked, "Do you think that only a portion of the land would be opened—namely, that alongside the railway line?" He replied,—

"I should think it would double the value of the land tinted on the map. This Strath Taieri Hundred was opened up and advertised, and a lot of Taieri settlers went up and started farming, but they found they could not work two establishments on account of the hilly road intervening, and came back. The Strath Taieri land is at present unavailable for settlement on account of its inaccessibility."

That was very valuable evidence, as showing that not only would the land be beneficially occupied if made accessible, but its increased value for sale would actually pay for the construction of the railway. He would now refer to one or two objections which had been raised. It had been said that the report as to the practicability and cost of the line was not conclusive. That was true: no detailed survey had taken place; but he thought honorable members would admit that all the promoters of such a Bill as this should do in this respect had been done. At the same time, it would be the duty of the Government, if the Bill were passed, to make a detailed survey. If it were shown that the railway could not be constructed out of the proceeds of the land now being reserved, it should not be entered upon without further reference to Parliament. It had been said that this work was too large and grave a one to be intrusted to a railway trust such as had been proposed, and, as he had said before, he agreed in that opinion. It had also been said, by gentlemen who were conversant with the working of the waste land laws of Otago, that, if the land were left to be dealt with by the Waste Lands Board of Otago, without any further provision than that now existing in the Bill, which was to the effect that the Board was to sell the land under the ordinary waste land laws of the province, it would be left open to the Board to sell it or not to sell it as they chose, and it was just possible that the Board might not feel inclined to sell it, or, if they did sell it, they might dispose of it in such dribblets that the sum realized would not cover the cost of the construction of the railway. That was the opinion of gentlemen who had a full knowledge of the working of the Otago Waste Lands Ordinance; and it ought to be made quite clear in the Bill that the land should be sold in a prudent and business-like manner as speedily as possible, in order to repay the money which had been expended in the construction of the line. He was afraid he had wearied the Council, and he felt that he was dealing with a subject with which he was not so familiar as some other honorable members of the Council; but he was anxious to do justice to it to the best of his ability. It was a very great pity that the principle he had been advocating had not been acted on heretofore—namely, that the land should be made to pay the cost of construction of the railways. He hoped they would not stop at the present proposal, but that they would dispose of a considerable portion of their landed estate in the way proposed by the Bill. He believed that, instead of the colony being at all poorer for disposing of its land in that way, it would be richer: in fact, when they had disposed of even one-half of their landed estate in that way they would be better off than they were at present. He hoped that those honorable members who approved of this principle would not allow any differences of opinion as to the particular route which this railway should take to prejudice them against the Bill. The matter had been fairly considered and reported on by a Committee of the other House, and that Committee was in favour of this particular line; and he trusted that those honorable gentlemen who still held the opinion that another route which had been suggested was the best would not insist on their opinion, but would agree to the line proposed in the Bill. He hoped the Council would agree to the second reading of the Bill. As he had already said, he thought the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and when the report of that Committee was brought down he was sure the decision of the Committee would be acceptable to the Council.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN said the Hon. Mr. Hall had made a long and interesting, but not a wearisome, speech. At the same time, it was a most remarkable speech. In fact, he had never heard such an extraordinary speech during the whole of his career in Parliament. There was one word which was repeated many times during the course of the speech, and that was the little word "if." The whole thing, according to the honorable gentleman, would be right "if" this, that, or the other thing were done. He had no faith in these "ifs," and if he were in order in moving, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, he would do so.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the honorable gentleman who had introduced this Bill in an exhaustive and able speech showed, he thought, satisfactorily to the Council that the proposal made for the construction of the Strath Taieri and Clyde Railway was not one new to the Legislature. This proposal was similar to that originally made when the Public Works and Immigration scheme was introduced, and he, for one, very much regretted that it was not given a larger development at that time. He knew honorable gentlemen would say that in the presence of the great necessities of the country they had no business to impoverish their means and to lessen their assets; but let them not draw a red-herring across the scent, and bring a totally foreign person—foreign not only as regarded his locality, but foreign also to the consideration—into their discussions. This was a matter which the public creditor had no concern with at all, and there was no greater fallacy than that of throwing this public creditor at their heads upon every occasion when they were talking about their assets in land. Not only had the colony not borrowed any money whatever upon the credit of its Land Fund, but there was no foreign creditor who would fail to lay the whole subject of our resources before his solicitor before he invested in the funds of the colony, and no lawyer who would fail to point out to him that our Land Fund was a vanishing fraction, and must not be considered as any security whatever for the money he was about to lend to this country. The public creditor lent his money upon three securities—upon that of our integrity, upon that of our industry, and upon that of the productiveness of the country. He would take the first two for granted. With regard to the third, did or did not such a proposal as this increase the productiveness of the country? He was given to understand—and he had been at pains to inform himself on the subject—that the district through which this Strath Taieri Railway was to go was at present unapproachable by anything like a practicable and useful road such as would enable grain traffic to be carried on upon it. It was not a district like some through which railways had been made, in which the land belonged to private individuals, who reaped the entire advantage of the railway constructed at the public expense. Whatever increase of value there might be resulting from the railway construction would fall, under this proposal, to the benefit of the colony. The proposal, as he took it, and as alone the Government would support it, was a proposal under which certain land, instead of being hurriedly seized and sold to speculators in expectation of a railway being made there, would be reserved, and would be sold after the railway was constructed, when the highest possible price could be expected from it, and when its productiveness would become a material factor in the national prosperity. A large district like this, stated, upon the best authority, to be one of considerable fertility, and of an agricultural character, opened up by a railway line to the sea, might in future yield a grain export, if not equal to that of those great centres Timaru and Oamaru, at all events sufficiently large to make a very considerable increase to the grain export of the colony. At this moment there were several kinds of railways legalized in this country. There was the trunk railway, the outcome and the first proposal of the Public Works policy—the national trunk railway of the country. There was the district railway proposed by the Bill which was on the Order Paper of the Council, and which had to receive a certain guarantee from the Government and a certain guarantee from the district. And, lastly, there was the district railway also contemplated by that Bill, which was an entirely private speculation, and had no advantage except a right to obtain lands, and to run a railway under regulations requisite for the safety of the public. If the proposal in this Bill met with favour from the Council there would be a fourth kind of railway—a railway built in such a way as to add nothing to the burdens of the people—a branch railway which would open a totally new district to the industrial part of the population, besides creating an increased return from the Land Fund beyond that which they could have hoped to get if that railway had not been made, and the land had been disposed of at its market value. He was informed on all sides that, if the railway were made, the land, instead of being worth £1, might be expected by the time the railway was finished to be worth £3 per acre. This was the one kind of case in which a large allocation of land was in his opinion allowable. This was not a case in which they were really taking anything out of the pocket of the country. Assuming that this work was a necessity—and the residents in that part of the country all believed it to be a necessity—it would, at all events, add a new asset in the railway itself, without adding further burdens or in any way impoverishing the country, and the freeholders in that district would not derive a large fortune from the railway, but the Government itself. He should think it exceedingly wrong to take a large endowment in land in a district unless the Government reaped the great bulk of the increment of value which the project was likely to create. It was very true that they must begin to regard the Land Fund now as one great element in the means of the country. From a return which had been placed upon the table of another branch of the Legislature it would be seen that the entire amount of land throughout the colony was estimated to be worth £15,000,000. From a statement of the late Treasurer's finance it was to be seen that he made both ends meet by putting his hands upon 72½ per cent. of the estimated amount of the land revenue for the forthcoming year, and that, having then a deficit of £167,000, he proposed to take that also from the Land Fund, as an exceptional demand, thus raising the entire contribution he proposed to take from the Land Fund to something considerably over 90 per cent. Therefore we were really living to a great extent upon our Land Fund. But he maintained that, although that was the case, and although superficially the reserving of 400,000 acres looked like a great reduction from our means, still it was not so in reality. This land was not land which was now available for sale. If it were available for sale it would only be so at a very moderate price indeed, and would probably be devoted to entirely pastoral uses. Under the present project the residue, after paying for the railway, would be worth more than its present value, and there would be a large agricultural population settled upon what was sold, who would, indirectly, very much add to the wealth of the country. The reserving of the land was, to his mind, an absolute necessity, unless they were prepared to add £500,000, or whatever the estimated cost of the railway might be, to the already monstrous debt of the country; for, if they did not reserve the land, the immediate result would be that speculators would gobble up every bit of it at the lowest price that the law admitted, and they and not the colony would obtain the increment of value. There had been too much of that kind of thing in this country—too much purchasing of land in anticipation of railways going through it, and too much hardness in subsequent sales where the land had to be repurchased by the Crown for public works. A glance at the return of the amount paid for taking railways through private land would somewhat stagger honorable gentlemen if they gave a few minutes' attention to the subject. The Government could not adopt this Bill in its entirety. The first four clauses laid down that part of the principle which the Government were prepared to support. It would be necessary, of course, to supplement the Bill by some other clauses to give it effect; but the entire proposal to give authority over this extent of country and this enormous borrowing power to three or four individuals the Government could not support. He would be glad to hear what those who he heard objected very strongly to the Bill would find to say against it. It was not a Bill for which the present Government were in any way responsible. It was introduced into Parliament during the time of their predecessors, and, as far as he knew, was not objected to by them. The present Government had considered the Bill, and objected to it so far as he had indicated to the Council; but, looking to the great necessity for making the railway, and looking also to the heavy burdens already imposed on the colony, and the unwillingness both of the public and the Government to add to those burdens except for making the main trunk railways of the country, and bearing in mind that this proposal would ultimately result in the construction of the railway at no cost to the people, the Government thought a fair trial should be given to the first four clauses of the Bill. He hoped that the Council would not, simply on the bare ground that there had been reserves made before of an improper kind, and because there was always a tendency in some directions to seize upon too much of the public estate, hurriedly throw out the Bill. The Council had on many occasions, even where considerable prejudice existed, given very fair consideration to what honorable gentlemen said when introducing Bills of this character, and had given the promoters full opportunity to prove their case. He hoped that they would not make a singular exception in this case. The honorable gentleman who introduced the Bill proposed that it should stand referred to a Select Committee. That proposal appeared to him a very reasonable one, because the only doubt that existed in his mind—and he thought it would weigh very much with other honorable gentlemen—was, whether or not the necessity for this line, and its urgency, could be proved. If evidence were brought to satisfy a Select Committee upon that point, if the statements made by the honorable gentleman who introduced the Bill were corroborated, and if, on reflection, honorable gentlemen came to the conclusion that this was not such a very dangerous proposal, as long as Parliament never parted with its direct control over the arrangements, nor allowed the Ministry to escape its responsibility by putting the responsibility upon anybody else, then he thought that the Bill ought to have its trial, and the experiment should be authorized by law.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY felt himself unequal to speaking, and he would not venture upon the task except that he felt it would be a dereliction of duty on his part if he did not express what he felt on this occasion. He entirely dissented from the observations made by the Colonial Secretary in the eulogium he passed upon the speech of the honorable gentleman who introduced this Bill as being a most conclusive and exhaustive one. He would not willingly say anything offensive to the Hon. Mr. Hall, but he would say that he never heard a speech from that honorable gentleman which to him was so extremely disappointing. He wished to abstain from making any personal remarks, but he must say that the guise in which the honorable gentleman came forward as the promoter of this Bill was so flimsy and transparent that it was impossible not to see through what he thought any person who looked at the matter would perceive. A great deal had been said about the principle of the Bill. But the principle that had been argued was a principle affecting the interests of a locality. It was not a national principle. It was a principle affecting a locality, and that only. He did not hesitate to say that this Bill was the precursor, the forerunner, of further measures of the same kind which would be brought before the Council. Would the honorable gentleman venture to say that a Bill of the same kind would not come from the Province of Canterbury shortly? The honorable gentleman justified the course he took in promoting this Bill by saying that he did so from an entirely disinterested motive—that he introduced a measure which had reference to a locality in which he had no interest or concern—and therefore he proceeded to argue upon its merits. He (Colonel Kenny) maintained that its merits were simply merits of detail affecting a locality. The very argument which the honorable gentleman used at the outset condemned it. He said that this course of taking an endowment of 400,000 acres was allowable because it was an ingredient in the Vogelien scheme, but that unfortunately it was abandoned, and the whole Railway and Public Works scheme rested on the basis of borrowed money. He maintained that this was one essential and most important principle, and the one most advisable to follow under the scheme of Mr. Vogel.

The Hon. Mr. HALL did not say "the most important." He said that to his mind it was a very important principle, and a redeeming feature of the scheme.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY said that when he began to speak he expressed his desire to abstain from saying anything personal. He knew how critical the honorable gentleman was, and that he (Colonel Kenny) would come under the lash, as the honorable gentleman would take hold of the smallest argument or particular in which he erred. But yet he would convict the honorable gentleman upon his own assertion. It ill became the honorable gentleman—in advocating the principle that the Public Works and Railway scheme should have been launched, not purely on the principle of borrowed money, but on the principle of taking the public lands of the colony—to say that this was a proper and fitting occasion, for a purely local purpose, to advocate the taking of 400,000 acres. If the honorable gentleman had been sincere, this was what he would have said: “There is a large landed property belonging to the colony spread here and there—some in my own province, some in the Province of Otago. There was a great error made—we ought to have taken those lands on the origination of the Vogelian policy. Now, what I am going to do is to introduce a Bill the object of which will be to commence a process of that description throughout the colony.” What he (Colonel Kenny) maintained was that they ought not to localize, but to generalize, the Land Fund of the colony. Rather let it be made general public property, and out of the proceeds apportion sufficient to carry out necessary and important works in various parts of the colony. But for the honorable gentleman to say that he came before them—as he believed the honorable gentleman did—without any personal interest in the Bill whatever, while he knew, as a certain consequence, that the same thing would be done in the Province of Canterbury and elsewhere, was calculated to mislead the Council. They ought to regard this as the first step towards a grand attack upon the Land Fund of the colony for the purpose of localizing it; and they ought to resist this first attempt. He did not feel able to proceed with any further remarks, but he thought it was his duty, taking, as he knew he often did, the unpopular side, to express his sentiments on this matter. They were being misled—he knew the honorable gentleman would comment upon that remark, but, he repeated, they were being misled—by listening to arguments which showed that this measure in itself might be a good one if it could be considered apart from the interests of the whole colony, and regarded in the light of one single special Act. But if they took a wider view of it they would see the results to which it would lead; and he repeated what he had said on former occasions, that they were not acting fairly towards the public creditor in thus taking what was the only tangible asset on which they had borrowed vast sums of money. After borrowing all the money they could—and, he hoped, all they would be able to borrow—they were now to be induced to take away the only asset upon which they had borrowed, and the only property which was left to the colony, for the purpose of localizing it, and of making it instrumental in forwarding the private interests of persons, instead of the national interests of the colony.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said this was one of a class of Bills which ought not at any time to be introduced by a private member. Bills of this sort should emanate from the Government. In 1871 they had the great Public Works policy placed before them, and since that time they had made great sacrifices in the attempt to carry it out. But they were now to some extent asked to reverse that policy. It was difficult to believe that the policy had not been a partial failure. If it had not, why should they be asked to consider such a Bill as this? He looked upon it as the forerunner of many other similar Bills which were to follow. They knew that more were to come; but he maintained that the Government were bound to construct all the railways that were required by the colony if they were to carry out the policy inaugurated in 1870. He thought, however, that they were in too great a hurry with their railways. They already saw what had been the result of going so fast. In 1870 it was proposed to spend ten millions in a period extending over ten years. At the end of that time the railways constructed out of this money were to a great extent to be self-supporting. Many people at that time thought the proposal a very wild one; but what had they done in the meantime? They found that at the end of seven years double the sum had been spent, and they were left with a very heavy burden upon their shoulders. The result was that their financial position at present was anything but satisfactory. He contended that if it was necessary to make these reserves—and he agreed with the proposal to some extent—it ought to be done by the Government upon one general plan. They should make reserves all over the colony, and deal with them in one Bill. They could then give authority to survey these different lines. Many lines were being surveyed at the present time without any authority from that Council, and of course, when the lines were surveyed, if the Government of the day approved of them they would submit them to the Council in the usual Railway Bills, and the Council could then consider them on their merits, and decide which lines should be constructed and which should not. There was no doubt that this Bill and those which were to follow were the result of the weakness of the Government of the day, who submitted to political pressure. He contended that the Government ought to resist that pressure. If they were unable to do so they should resign. The scramble of 1871 and 1872 was bad enough, but if they allowed this kind of thing to go on they would see a very much worse state of things. He understood the Hon. Mr. Hall to say that there was such a difference of opinion as to the route which the railway should take into the interior of Otago, that he had taken charge of the Bill because no Otago member would take charge of it.

The Hon. Mr. HALL—I did not say they refused to take charge of it.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said that they knew at any rate that there was a very great difference of opinion as to the route, and, if a proper survey were made, it might be found that a very much better line could be made. The honorable gentleman also said that the estimated cost of the line was £540,000. They knew that that estimate must have been based upon a very rough survey, and, from his own knowledge of the country in the part of Otago through which the railway would run, he believed that the line would cost a very much larger sum. The honorable gentleman also said that he thought it was judicious to reserve all our landed estate by making it a means to construct the railways, and that they ought to do it as fast as possible. He did not think that was a wise or prudent course. They would be borrowing money indirectly, and it was to some extent the same as selling the land, because they would have nothing to show for it but the railway. The land would be swallowed up in order to meet the charges for construction. He thought that the Council should be a little careful, considering that the colony had such a heavy debt. They should to some extent conserve a considerable portion of the landed estate of the colony. They would always receive something for the lease of it, and it would at any rate be putting by some portion of the land, which they could hardly look upon as revenue. They should look upon it as capital, and reserve some of it for a rainy day. If they went on in this way, what would be the result in twenty years? They would have a heavy debt. No doubt some of these railways would pay, but they could hardly expect them all to meet the full charges for many years to come. They would have a heavy debt, with nothing whatever to meet it but direct taxation. That would be the legacy they would leave to those who came after them. He thought it would be better that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee before being read a second time, and he should therefore move, as an amendment, That the Strath Taieri Railway Bill be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to consider and report upon the principle involved in the Bill, and also upon any other proposals now before Parliament having a like object—the reservation of waste lands for the construction of railways; and with further instructions to consider whether, and, if so, how far, the adoption of such principles may affect the due provision for the charges now existing by law upon the land revenue. Committee to have power to call for persons and papers, and to report in a fortnight. The Committee to consist of the Hon. Mr. Miller, the Hon. Mr. Hall, the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bill, the Hon. Mr. Hart, the Hon. Dr. Pollen, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, and the mover.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE said he had taken considerable trouble in order that he might understand the proposition now under the consideration of the Council. As far as the information at his disposal enabled him to form an opinion, he thought the probabilities were in favour of the desirability of constructing this line. It appeared to him that, in a matter of such grave importance, the Government should be altogether responsible for a measure of this kind. He took exception in the strongest manner to the pretensions of any private member who introduced such a Bill to the Council. The public spirit which actuated a private member who introduced such a measure must be admitted, and the necessities of the present complicated political position no doubt went far to excuse the acceptance of such a responsibility by any private member; but he did not think that that complicated position was sufficient to pardon the acceptance by them of such a measure introduced in such a manner. He thought it very likely that they would be forced into the adoption of some such mode for the construction of lines of railway. Considering their financial position, and considering the urgent necessity of developing the resources of the colony with the view of easing their financial difficulties, they might find it necessary to accept such proposals, even though that course might be in some degree fundamentally undesirable. But he could not think that the interests of the district to which this Bill referred could suffer materially by waiting a reasonable time for the further consideration of the matter, and he fully believed, from the investigations which he had made, that at some later period some Government, and that soon, would introduce such a measure, probably a measure that would be particularly applicable to this district, and then the Council would be in a better position to accept the grave responsibility which the adoption of such a measure in the present condition of their finances necessarily involved. The principle that by the construction of railways the value of the land is increased, which enhanced value goes in liquidation of the indebtedness of the colony accruing from such expenditure, was a principle which all were pretty well prepared to accept. But there were other questions to consider. There was the question as to route, the question as to cost, the question as to gauge, the question as to weight of rail,—the whole question of system would have to be raised in this country. He was credibly informed that we might have constructed railways sufficient for all practical purposes at one-third or one-half the cost we had incurred. In Colorado there were now running railways fit to carry the traffic of the New Zealand railways, and these had been constructed for one-third the cost of the New Zealand railways. The profits accruing from the traffic not only went to maintain the line, but to improve it, if necessary, while the finances of the country were relieved to a large extent owing to the smallness of the money invested and the light charges for interest. In Colorado they were running railways over mountain-tops. Perhaps it would be hardly fair in a hilly country like this to call them mountains, but they were running trains over hills like the Rimutaka, and the lines over which such trains were run had been constructed for one-third the cost of the New Zealand railways. The truth was, he submitted, that we, as Englishmen, had got into a railway groove, and the construction of our railways was very much more expensive than was generally the case in other countries. If such was the case, and if the facts he had stated were correct, it appeared to him that the true interests of the country could not in any degree suffer if in this case there was a delay of twelve months. There was no estimate of the cost of construction: there was no known quantity in the problem, except that of the existence of the land. If that were so—if the cost of construction and all other necessary information remained in the position of unknown quantities—there could be no reason whatever for any hurry over the construction of this line. He wished it to be clearly understood that he did not take any specific exception to the principles set forth by the honorable gentleman who introduced the measure, but he did take exception to any unnecessary haste, and on that ground he trusted that the Council would see fit to give all parties further time and further opportunity for considering this large question.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER hoped the Council would agree to the proposition made by the Hon. Mr. Buckley, for he was quite sure, if the Committee were appointed and inquiries made into the proposals contained in the Bill, that their report would satisfy the Council that there were ample reasons for the passing of this measure. This was really the first attempt to open the great interior of Otago—at any rate to open up what might be called the great central part of Otago; and when the Hon. Colonel Kenny spoke of this measure as one which only affected a district or locality he rendered himself amenable to the charge of never having looked at a map or made himself acquainted with the country it was proposed to open up. He ventured to say there was no part of New Zealand—and honorable gentlemen could not accuse him of having held up the resources of Otago as superior to those of other parts of the colony—which afforded such great promise of development as central Otago. The country through which this railway would pass must progress to an extent which could not now be anticipated. The railway, if constructed, would open up a district containing nearly two million acres of land—at any rate, one million and three-quarters—and a very considerable proportion of that was agricultural land of good value. It would tap the Lake District, a district as yet comparatively unknown, for there could be no doubt that the line would not stop at Cromwell, but would go on and tap the Lake country. The Hon. Colonel Kenny, before he spoke as he had done of a measure like that before the Council, ought to take a trip through the country, and see what it was he talked about.

The Hon. Colonel KENNY must have been misunderstood. He had not spoken of the railway in a contemptuous sense, but had merely alluded to it as being not a national scheme, but a local scheme.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said that was the reason he was taking exception to what the honorable gentleman had said. What did the honorable gentleman mean by a national scheme, if a district which possessed such valuable land as central Otago was not to be opened up in this manner? You might as well say that New Zealand was a locality. It must be obvious, provided the advantages it was hoped to derive by the construction of this railway were obtained, that the colony as a whole would benefit thereby. The colony must enormously benefit by the development of such great resources as were known to exist in central Otago. He had always had great respect for the honorable gentleman's opinions, because he knew they were genuine and real, and expressed exactly what he felt; but if the honorable gentleman's policy was to be accepted it would simply mean stagnation—New Zealand would never progress. Had the honorable gentleman ever been in those parts of the country which had been already opened up by the railways? He (Mr. Miller) could show the honorable gentleman country which ten years ago it was never dreamed would be put under the plough during the lifetime of the present generation, but upon which there now stood the waving corn. He alluded to the Maerewhenua country, about thirty miles from Oamaru. He was up there a couple of years since for the first time for many years, and he rode through 2,000 acres of corn as high as his horse's head. The quantity of grain exported from that district now was enormous. The Council should not continue to harp upon the question of the expense of doing this and that if the work were necessary. He was quite sure, so far as he had been able to judge, that the Committee in another place were quite right in accepting the report of the engineer as to this line being the best. He believed the engineer to be strictly accurate in stating that this was the best line to open up the central part of Otago, although, as a resident of the northern part of Otago, he should not express this opinion so freely if he consulted the wishes of the persons residing in the Oamaru District, because, as was well known, they had been extremely anxious to get another line which ran from the valley of the Waitaki over the Maerewhenua Pass. He did not think they were right. He thought, looking at the interests of the country, this was the proper line to make; and he had not the slightest doubt, if this line were made, whoever of them were spared would live to see the day when it would be admitted that the wisest thing possible had been done in passing this Bill. It had been said, with perfect truth, that, after all, the whole argument hinges upon this: the great increase in value to the land in the district after the line had been constructed. It had been said that the additional value would be represented by 7s. 6d. to 10s. per acre. What did that mean when they came to the figures? There were nearly 2,000,000 acres of land; 500,000 acres were to be reserved. That left over 1,200,000 acres, which, calculated at 7s. 6d. per acre, would return an amount very nearly equal to the estimated cost of the line. That was the principal argument in favour of the Bill, because, if they could arrive at the certainty that they would enhance the value of the land to that extent, they would be running no risk in making the line; and all the arguments so often brought up in the Council about taking away the assets of the colony from the public creditor must be looked upon as simply moonshine. If we could increase the productive power of the country, we need look no further: there could be no question about that. The case of the Maerewhenua country was a case in point, and he had no doubt that there were plenty of instances in Canterbury to which honorable gentlemen could allude equally in point as showing the importance and value of looking at this matter in a fair and liberal light. They ought not to adopt what he might term the narrow view which the Hon. Colonel Kenny sometimes seemed to take upon these matters. He had no doubt that the Council would agree to the proposal of the Hon. Mr. Buckley, and therefore it would be unnecessary for him to make any further remarks respecting the Bill. He might say that he was at first very much staggered when he looked into the details of the Bill; but it seemed to him that there was such a general desire on the part of the promoters of this measure that the details should be set right, and that the Government should have the whole control over the matter, that there was no need for him to refer further to it. The Hon. Mr. Buckley had asked why the Government had not taken the construction of those railways in hand. Well, he took it that the Government's hands were so full that they had not had time to attend to these matters. He thought it told well for the energy, industry, and enterprise of the people when such a measure as this proceeded directly from the people, supported as it was by arguments which, to his mind, were quite conclusive.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said he intended to support the Bill. The Hon. Dr. Grace had said it would be better to postpone the Bill for twelve months, but he (Captain Fraser) held that a great injustice would be done if that course were taken. This was a scheme to make a railway, and not to deal with the land until the railway was made. A considerable portion of the Crown lands had been surveyed, and he regretted to say that the Waste Lands Board of Otago seemed determined to get rid of all the Crown lands in that provincial district on the system of deferred payments. If this Bill were postponed, a great deal of the waste lands in Otago would be disposed of before the railway was made, and therefore he hoped his honorable friend would not insist on having the Bill postponed. He himself had a thorough knowledge of the country. All the land between the beginning and ending points of the proposed railway was Crown land, with the exception of a few thousand acres: in fact, nearly all the land between Clyde and Strath Taieri was Crown land. There were no engineering difficulties whatever to be encountered, though perhaps the making of the line through the Taieri Gorge would add a little to the expense. The railway would run near to the Town of Naseby, which stood at an elevation of 1,600 feet above the level of the sea, and near that town he had seen as fine crops of potatoes and oats as could be seen in any part of New Zealand. The whole of the land up to the Maniototo Plain was of good quality. That plain was bounded on two sides by high and well-grassed hills, and on one side of it there were a lake and a river, and the land in that locality was as good as any which could be found in any part of the colony. On the north-west side it was bounded by a low range of sedimentary hills, containing gold throughout. The Government had made a large water-race, and had been at great expense in making a sludge channel; and the farmers settled in Maniototo would always find a good market for their produce in the Town of Naseby. Much of the country between Maniototo and Manuherikia might, he thought, be put under crop. At Clyde the grape and the almond tree grew to perfection, and fruit of all kinds would thrive; and he had no doubt the district would in time be called upon to supply Dunedin and other parts of Otago with fruit. It would be a great mistake if the railway stopped at Clyde; it should go on to Cromwell at once. There were no engineering difficulties in the way, and Cromwell should certainly be the entrepôt. There were about 800,000 acres of good land in this district, a great part of which might be put under cultivation. He knew the whole country well, and he knew that cereals would grow well there. The Hon. Colonel Kenny had spoken of this as a purely local matter, but that was a peculiar view to hold, considering that it affected the whole of the colony. One-third of the population of the colony was in Otago, and, when so great a proportion of the inhabitants of New Zealand were interested, it could not be called a local matter, for it was in reality a national one. This line would open up a vast extent of country beyond Cromwell, and would run through fine agricultural and pastoral lands, and he had no doubt that the day would come when the colony would be dependent for much of its wheat on the district referred to. He trusted that there would be no opposition to the Bill, as it was one which would do a great deal for the interests of Otago and other provinces also.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES agreed with the honorable gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill that the land revenue could not be more legitimately applied than to the construction of works of a useful character, such as railways, harbour works, &c. Such works always paid, because they lessened the cost to the community of transit, shipment, and so forth. In many parts of the country it had been found to be much less expensive to form railways than to form good roads, owing to the absence of proper materials for forming roads. Those who had anything to do with the forming of railways some twelve or fifteen years ago, when railways were first begun in this colony, knew very well that the expense of forming those railways was very much greater than it was at present. In those days there were very few engineers in the colony, and comparatively few contractors. The price of iron was high, and it was difficult to obtain supplies of material, owing to the fact that communication with England was much less frequent than at present. There was no doubt, however, apart from that, that the price which had been paid for the construction of railways was very much higher than it ought to have been. The Hon. Dr. Grace had compared the cost of the railways in New Zealand with the cost of railways in Colorado, and that honorable gentleman had observed that railways constructed on the principle proposed in this Bill, as they were in Colorado, could be more cheaply made. He (Mr. Menzies) did not see that at all. He apprehended that the rate of wages and the cost of material had much more to do with the cost of the railways than the mere principle on which they were constructed. He could not see why a railway constructed on this principle could be made at a less cost than those constructed on any other principle. He did not think it made much difference whether the railways were constructed with borrowed money or whether land was given for the construction of them. The Hon. the Colonial Secretary had told the Council that a railway constructed on this principle involved no burden on the colony. Did it cost the colony one whit less whether the railways were paid for by borrowed money or in land? The cost to the colony would not be one penny less if land were given for the making of the railways.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE explained that what he had said was, that the land would be increased in value if this railway were constructed, and that the increment in value would pay the cost of the construction of the railway.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES had misunderstood the honorable gentleman. He accepted the honorable gentleman's explanation, for it showed that his views were quite in accordance with his (Mr. Menzies') own. He, however, did not agree with the honorable gentleman and some other honorable members that the land would rise in value only in consequence of the construction of this railway. He held that the land would rise in value whether the railway was made or not. Land in this colony was bound to rise in value very quickly. They all knew instances in which, in comparatively recently settled districts in the South, where the land was of good quality, the value had risen in five or six years from the upset price of £1 per acre to £7 per acre. And in those districts the agricultural land had nearly all passed out of the hands of the Crown into those of private individuals. Under such circumstances, the land must rise in value whether railways were made or not. And so would pastoral land. Pastoral land was abundant at present. It was true that there was not much of it open for sale; but as it came into the market there was no doubt that it would be eagerly bought up in a very few years: without any connection with the construction of railways, that land would increase in value quite as much as his honorable friend Mr. Hall pointed out would be the increase in value of the land in this particular district upon the construction of the railway. Supposing this railway were not constructed for the next three or four years, the pastoral land in the district was likely to rise in value independently altogether of the railway construction. He was well aware of the fact that land rose in value where railways were constructed. In all parts of the country where there was a considerable tract of arable land the experience of the last few years especially showed that that land rose very much in value in consequence of the increased facilities given by the construction of railways for the transit and export of produce to the shipping ports. He did not feel inclined to support this Bill; indeed, he should be disposed to vote against the second reading to-night; but, at the same time, he would be reluctant to vote against the proposed amendment to refer the Bill to a Select Committee in order to ascertain how far the Committee could recommend the Council to assent to the proposal. There were some parts of the Bill he could assent to, but he could not agree to the whole of the Bill for two or three reasons. In the first place, he considered that this was a work which should be done by the Government.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—It is done by the Government.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—It was not done by the Government according to his (Mr. Menzies') view of the matter. The Government had already undertaken the construction of railways, and it should not allow the power to construct main lines to pass into the hands of private individuals. This Bill proposed to give a trust consisting of a number of individuals the control of the matter—the power to accept contracts and see to the management of the railway. It necessarily involved the question of establishing an extensive staff, in order to carry out these works—an extensive engineering staff to make the necessary surveys, take the levels, and see that the work was properly carried out. The Government already possessed such a staff. The work that the Government had been engaged in for a number of years past had now drawn so near to a close that its staff would by-and-by have much less to do. The engineering staff would no doubt require to be reduced. For all he knew, that had already been done. Seeing that the work was so far completed, the necessity for continuing the strong engineering staff the Government had had for so many years back no longer existed. If the colony was prepared to sanction the construction of this work, the Government should undertake it—it should undertake the preliminary work and the supervising work, without any additional expense, the present staff being quite sufficient to enable it to do the work. He held that all the leading lines of railway should be in the hands of the Government, and that only branch lines of a purely local character should be intrusted to private companies. He should be disposed to object to another Bill, which was read a second time the other day—the District Railways Bill—on that ground, were it not that he saw that the whole matter was under the control of the Government, which might stop any work which it thought would in any way conflict or interfere with the lines it had already constructed. He thought that Bill might be allowed to pass, with some alterations which were absolutely necessary. In this particular case he held that, while it was judicious and wise to set aside land to the full extent asked for in this Bill for the purpose of constructing a line of railway leading to the interior, that was the greatest length to which they ought to go at present. They had not sufficient information in detail to justify them in coming to a conclusion that this line was the best. Apart from that, the Government should undertake the necessary surveys in the course of the next year, during the recess, and be prepared in a future session to give the Council statistics regarding the line—full particulars such as they were entitled to expect before they were asked to agree to such a proposal. They should have engineering estimates in detail submitted to them, and all other requisite information, so that they might be in a position to determine whether this line should be constructed or not.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE rose in explanation of the matter to which his honorable friend had referred. The honorable gentleman had not thoroughly understood his remarks, and did not appreciate them. He (Dr. Grace) had said that it would be necessary to depart from their custom in the direction of railway construction—that it would be necessary for them to learn to construct cheaper lines on the principle of those in vogue in Colorado. The small cost of the construction of those lines, involving a very small charge for interest money, resulted in this: that the lines were cheaply constructed, that the district was equally improved by the cheaper line, and that, from the increased profit on traffic and the general improvement of the line, such profits resulted as were sufficient to improve the line in proportion to the requirements of the district. He submitted that this was a very important consideration to this colony, and one which, if honorable members would inquire into it, they would find had been justified by experience.

The Hon. Captain FRASER fully agreed with what the Hon. Dr. Grace had said. When at Home he visited the Festiniog Railway, which was only a two-foot gauge, and he believed that if they had adopted such a system of railways in the interior of Otago they would have effected a saving of £100,000. The tunnels on that line of railway were like rabbit-holes. He believed that his honorable friend Sir F. Dillon Bell could support what he said. If a similar plan were adopted in the construction of the branch lines of railway in this colony a great saving in the expense would be effected and a larger revenue derived.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK was afraid this Bill had not been well considered by those who drafted it. Clause 4 says, "The Government may construct and pay for the same out of proceeds of lands reserved." He understood the honorable gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill to say it was proposed that lands should be reserved in order that the Government might hereafter benefit from the increased value arising from the construction of railways. He wanted to know how the Government proposed to pay for the work in the meantime, unless they at once sold the land or borrowed money. If the land was sold at once, the railway might be constructed, but the Government would not be benefited by the expenditure of the money. He knew it was intended by the honorable the mover that the Government should benefit by the increased value of the property. He did not support the Bill at all, and he did not see that there had been any good reasons urged why they should go on with the second reading now. He thought it would be far better for the country if they were to finish all the railways which were in hand at the present time. They had an enormous expenditure now going on, and there was no likelihood of their having any return for it until the lines were complete. It should be the great aim of the Government, before undertaking any other line of railway, to complete those they had already in hand, and so relieve the country from the heavy burden under which it at present groaned. He did not think it was advisable that the country should endeavour by all means to part with its lands. He thought it would be better to husband some of those lands. As population increased, the land would be required, and it would be as well that they should have land for the people to go upon then, instead of disposing of it in the way proposed. It was just as well that some of the land should be shut up, instead of parting with it for speculative purposes. One objection he had to this Bill was that he really thought a measure of this kind should emanate from the Government—they should be responsible. What he had intended to propose before the Hon. Mr. Buckley moved his amendment—he did not know whether he should be in order in doing so—was that they might accept three clauses of this Bill at all events. He believed the immediate object of the promoters would be gained, it being that the land should be reserved from sale: if that were done, he thought they would be satisfied. As he could not now move an amendment, he would throw out a suggestion to the Select Committee to which the Bill would be referred, that they should consider a recommendation to the Government to set apart this reserve of 400,000 acres, and that the Minister for Public Works should, as soon as possible, make a detail survey, &c., and lay the same with all particulars before Parliament next session for its approval or otherwise. It was not expected that the Government would begin before twelve months were passed, and then, if they did not commence the work, some other course should be taken. He did not disapprove of the setting aside of land for remunerative purposes. It was just as good as borrowing money. At the same time, in this case the Government should be benefited by the increased value of the land, instead of private individuals.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said there were two points involved—one relating immediately to the Bill itself, and the other relating to a subject rather wide of the Bill, but which was raised in effect by the proposal of the Hon. Mr. Buckley to refer the question generally to a Select Committee. The promoters of the Bill had very good reason to congratulate themselves on having placed the measure in the hands of the Hon. Mr. Hall, because he was sure there was no member representing the Otago District who would have presented the proposal in a more attractive way than the honorable gentleman had succeeded in doing. Whatever might be the result of the debate, the honorable member had done his best to get the Bill passed; and the people of Otago, who were largely interested in the question, would have reason to thank him for the way in which he had introduced it to the Council. However, his honorable friend had gone into details which, by rather ingenious quotations from the evidence given by him (Sir F. Dillon Bell) before the Select Committee of the other House, made it appear that he had been a strong advocate for the particular route described in the Bill. The honorable gentleman did not rightly understand the view he took of the matter, and he would endeavour in a few words to show to the Council why he thought they ought to pause before they gave an immediate assent to the proposal, and why there were reasons to think that the expectations which were held out might not ultimately be realized. Before he went into that matter, however, he would first refer generally to the construction of a railway into the interior of Otago, and he did so especially in regard to the view which he understood to be advocated by the Hon. Colonel Kenny. There was a vast tract of pastoral country in the interior of Otago which was at present occupied mainly by a gold fields population, and which was thought by many people to contain land capable of growing wheat, and therefore of sustaining a large population. The people of that district contributed largely to the taxation of the country, and paid their full share of the burdens that the railway system had imposed upon the country. These people said, "We have a fine territory which, we tell you, is able to carry a large additional population: will you give us neither a road nor a railway to it?" When the Legislature abolished the system of provincial government this question was raised over and over again: "In what way, if you abolish the means by which the wants of the outlying districts have hitherto been met, are you going to supply their place?" On the one hand, there were a great number of people who said, "If you abolish the provincial system you will have nothing to take its place for opening up the country;" while, on the other hand, there were quite as many people, of whom Sir Julius Vogel was the chief, who said, "If you carry Abolition you will never hear the words 'roads and bridges' in the Parliament of New Zealand." But the quiet country settlers, who grew their wheat, or oats, or wool in the interior, and did not spend their time walking on the pavements in towns, had all along feared that when the provincial system was abolished they would be met by the greatest difficulty that had yet existed in the colony—namely, that while the whole apparent resources of the colony were being pledged for making railways along the coast-line, there would be very little money available for extending colonization into the interior, and fulfilling that which the Provincial Governments aimed at—the settlement of the country. He now asked honorable members how they proposed to answer the question put by people like those who lived on the Maniototo Plains. Were they to have nothing to enable them to carry their produce to the seaport? Honorable members might see on the Order Paper of the other House motions which had been lying there for weeks to the effect that, as it was patent to everybody that the County Councils could not make roads, it was the duty of the General Government to do it; and Parliament was asked to find the money. What was the practical result of that? Why, nearly £200,000 was asked for upon the Supplementary Estimates merely for the construction of roads this year. Did the late Colonial Secretary or the present Colonial Secretary propose to inform the Council out of what fund that money was to be paid? Every day on the Order Paper of the other House new proposals appeared for fresh sums of money on the Supplementary Estimates for the construction of roads and bridges. The Otago settlers in the interior, for instance, asked, "How are you going to give us the means of access to the seaboard?" It was quite certain the county system could not give it. There were no means by which this great tract of land could be made available for settlement, unless the colony was prepared to spend a great deal of money upon it. It might be pretended that that was the business of the people concerned, and not the business of the Legislature. But they might depend upon it that this was only the beginning of urgent applications of the same sort which would come from every part of the colony, North and South, which they must consider on some definite and broad ground, and could not hope to put aside. The Hon. Mr. Buckley said, "There are a great many proposals of this kind coming before us; let us refer them all to a Select Committee, and let us see how the proposals and the principles can be applied, and how we can best deal with them." That, he thought, was a most reasonable course; and he was glad to find that the honorable gentleman in charge of this Bill agreed to it, because in all probability, if some proposal of that sort had not been agreed to, those who were interested in this Bill would have seen it thrown out on the second reading. But his honorable friend, in the evidence he had quoted, had not shown the Council what the real difficulty was about the Strath Taieri line. The Select Committee of the other House of Parliament had come to the conclusion they did upon the recommendations contained in the report of the District Engineer, Mr. Blair. But the Engineer had not had time to make anything but a flying survey, and there were no detailed estimates to enable them to judge of the cost of this proposed line. Mr. Blair said, "In conclusion, if it is the intention of the Government to take steps towards constructing a railway into the interior of Otago, I have no hesitation in recommending the Strath Taieri line as emphatically the shortest and easiest route, that will in its course open up the most good country for settlement." But he also said, "I cannot without a more detailed survey give anything like a trustworthy estimate of the cost of a railway from Dunedin to Cromwell via Strath Taieri." Now, if the Committee had thought it worth while to dwell upon the evidence of Mr. James McKerrrow, Assistant Surveyor-General, whose opinions on this matter were the more deserving of consideration because he was a man of inflexible integrity and fairness, whose attainments as a surveyor were second to none in the service, they would have seen that his opinion was that there would be enormous rock-cuttings required to secure the gradients which the Hon. Mr. Hall had said his (Sir F. Dillon Bell's) evidence so much commended. The gradients, if so obtained, were undoubtedly better on the Strath Taieri than on any of the other alternative lines, and the quantity of available agricultural land open for settlement was very much greater on the Strath Taieri line; but he feared that what he had told the promoters and his honorable friend Mr. Hall about the cost would be borne out, and that, instead of £600,000, more nearly £1,000,000 would be required to make the line. When the promoters asked him to support this measure he told them they had not taken sufficient means to inform the Legislature about the probable cost, and they would find the quantity of land which they were setting apart as a fund out of which that cost was to be provided was not enough. It would be a very serious thing if it should be found—not upon a flying examination with levels taken after a few days' inspection of the country, but upon those further detailed surveys which alone could justify the Government in undertaking a work of such magnitude—that the quantity of land proposed to be set apart was quite inadequate to meet the probable cost of the line, and that a considerable addition would be necessary to supplement the original reserve. Now, the reference to a Select Committee would enable questions of this kind to be investigated. They might come to the conclusion that they could not leave the population of the interior of Otago without some means of access to the coast, and that it would be cheaper to let them have a railway than to make and maintain a road, which would otherwise be necessary: but there was a point with regard to which he could not yet agree with his honorable friend. It was assumed that the whole of this district would grow wheat profitably. He had already said, on more than one occasion, that he regarded that as very doubtful. There was a large quantity of available good land on the line of the proposed railway, but it had not yet been conclusively shown that it was capable of growing wheat, though it would grow oats; and he believed that if the greater part were only capable of producing oats the railway would not be reproductive: and the Committee might well take evidence on that point. But the most important question remained: How could it be expected that the Council would agree to a proposal for making this railway, without reference to the numerous other proposals that were before Parliament for making railways by means of large reserves of Crown land in Otago and Canterbury, as well as in other provinces? It was therefore all the more necessary to learn to what extent it was intended that this principle should be applied, and what was the ultimate expenditure into which the country might be led. These questions could be considered by the Committee proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley. He agreed with the principle upon which the Hon. Mr. Hall dwelt in moving the second reading of this Bill, but thought its application and its results ought to be considered by the Council over a much wider field of inquiry. For a long time he had been convinced that the course they had taken in finance had ended in placing the colony in a position of serious and immediate difficulty, which had been aggravated by the changes made last year in the charges that formerly existed upon the Land Fund. There was nothing more true than the doctrine the Hon. Mr. Hall laid down, that it was wise to make the land the means of executing such public works as the one referred to in this Bill. But that principle was not one to be applied to one particular district in one particular province: it was a principle which, if adopted at all, must be applicable over the whole colony. The time was come when they would be inevitably obliged to complete the abolition of the provincial system, by placing the whole resources of the State in one common fund, for the purpose of dealing with that fund as the interest and welfare of the whole State demanded. How were they to meet demands daily increasing upon the Consolidated Fund for precisely the objects which his honorable friend and himself agreed that the Land Fund ought to be specially applicable to? Was it right that the House of Representatives, if it ever got to the Estimates this year at all, should load the Supplementary Estimates with sums for every sort of road and bridge, to be charged on the Consolidated Fund, when every one knew to an absolute certainty that the Consolidated Fund could not bear it? What was the use of asserting the principle that such objects should be provided for out of the Land Fund, when everybody knew that there existed a large deficiency in the Fund, which would have to be made good by the taxation of the people? If a consideration of that kind was worth thinking of, if they could not, without losing their own self-respect, give their assent to Estimates which they knew could not be paid for, the Council should take into consideration what it was they had done about the charges placed on the Land Fund already. If they looked at the Financial Statement of the present year they would see that the charges placed on the Land Fund for the current year amounted to about £650,000. Therefore, to meet those charges, including subsidies under the county system, they had to provide for raising out of the Land Fund throughout the colony a sum of money not much less than £800,000 or £900,000 in every year. Now, although there was lying in the Treasury half a million of money from Canterbury land sales, there was very little being received from land sales in other provinces. The charges imposed by law on the Land Funds of the two Provinces of Otago and Canterbury alone now amounted to little less than £300,000 a year. Then this question arose: If they assented to the proposals, made in the other House of Parliament, to set aside large tracts of land for the construction of various lines of railway, how would they get money enough from the Land Fund to meet the charges already laid upon it? Let them take the proposals which were to be found on the Order Paper of the other House. There were 200,000 acres for a line by Shag Valley into the interior of Otago; there was the Canterbury railway reserve of 300,000 acres; a proposal to lay aside 250,000 acres on the West Coast; 20,000 acres in Nelson; land to the value of £50,000 for the Tapanui Railway; lastly 60,000 acres for a railway to Fortrose and Edendale. Therefore, if they applied this principle of reserving lands for railways to all the provinces, they would very soon deprive themselves entirely of the means of meeting the large charges which they placed upon the Land Fund by the Financial Arrangements Act of last year. At the present moment large advances were being made out of the Consolidated Fund to carry on the land administration of nearly all the provinces except Canterbury and Otago.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—And Otago also.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said those advances need never have been made in the case of Otago, if the pledges made in the Provincial Council in Otago, that the railways built by the province should be paid for out of sales of land to be made for the purpose, had been fulfilled. What was the result? The land was not sold, and they had a vast amount of provincial liabilities in Otago which the colony was now called upon to pay. The Consolidated Fund was being drained for advances in aid of the Land Fund; and, if everywhere they reserved the saleable land at present remaining, where would they in future obtain the money requisite to recoup the Consolidated Fund for those advances? The course they were taking made it absolutely certain that in a short time there would be no money available; and the inevitable result of reserving the saleable land in Otago would be that they would be obliged to sell the pastoral lands to the present occupants. Was that a thing which they considered it wise to be driven to? Was it advisable to pass new railway schemes in order to bring about that inevitable end? If so, let them do it with their eyes open, and let them realize the ultimate result to which they must come. As to other provinces, and especially those in the North Island, what did they propose to say to people in districts where there was no Land Fund, who were asking them for railways and roads, and for the colonization of their country? Would it be a sufficient answer to them to say that the principle which the Hon. Mr. Hall was contending for was a correct one, so long as it did not apply to them? Did the Council mean, by the principle, that where there was no Land Fund the settlers must be taxed, while the people who lived in districts where there was a Land Fund were to have such roads and railways as they pleased? It was certain that they could not meet the charges upon the Land Fund if they checked the supply of land in the market, and it was just as certain that they could not meet the charges upon the Consolidated Fund at all. But, if this was undeniably true, then it followed that, whether they liked it or not, they must deal with any new propositions for railways on a basis totally different from that on which they had been accustomed to deal with the schemes of the past. The first step was to see whether they could pay their way, and the Select Committee now proposed would have to consider how far the adoption of the principles laid down by his honorable friend would affect their capacity to do it. He was very much mistaken if this would not be found to be the result: that there was only one way by which they could pay their way at all, and that was by unifying the finances and treating the Consolidated and Land Funds as one common revenue, out of which they would deal with every proposal as it came up; with every due regard to the wants of particular districts certainly, but looking to their liabilities to the public creditor and the interests of the whole colony first of all.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT confessed that he had his doubts and fears about this Bill, but, at the same time, he must say that the Hon. Mr. Hall deserved the thanks of the Council for the manner in which he had brought the subject forward. Still, there were points untouched upon which he should have liked a little more information. The honorable gentleman did not allude to the population of the country through which the line would pass, neither did he say whether it was an agricultural district. To his mind those were the two most prominent matters to be taken into account in considering a proposal for the construction of a railway. He also felt rather inclined to oppose the Bill on the ground that the late Government on all occasions refused to sanction the construction of railways until the completion of the lines already in hand. That was a strong objection to this measure. At the same time, he was an advocate of progress. He maintained that they ought to assist in promoting the progress of the country, and he was on that ground disposed to support the second reading of the Bill. He was certainly disappointed with the speech of the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell. It left him in doubt as to which way the honorable gentleman was going to vote. As that honorable member was a resident of the district he should have thrown sufficient light upon the matter to remove all doubt from the minds of honorable members; but those doubts were increased, instead of being removed. As he had stated, his (Colonel Brett's) only objection to the Bill was that he thought the lines already commenced should be finished before these proposals were entertained. Besides, they had to consider what their means were. Had they the means? It was true they had the land, and land was money. There was no doubt about that. He would reserve his vote until the report of the Committee was brought up. The Committee was well selected, and he did not doubt that it would carefully consider the matter before arriving at a decision.

The Hon. Mr. HALL, in answer to the remarks of the Hon. Colonel Brett, said the population of the district to which the railway would run was considerable, and it would bring the centres of population on the Otago Gold Fields into improved communication with Dunedin. The population in the neighbourhood of that part of the proposed line which was near Dunedin was small at present, for the reason that the land had not yet been thrown open for sale or settlement; but the line would run through a large amount of good agricultural land, and that land, when it was thrown open for settlement, would carry a large population, a population which, if the railway was made, would form a thriving community, and would add largely to the wealth and prosperity of the colony. He would make a few remarks in reply to what had fallen from other honorable members. The only remarks he had to complain of were those made by the Hon. Colonel Kenny. He understood the honorable gentleman to say that he (Mr. Hall) was not justified in claiming to be disinterested in this matter, and that he was supporting the Bill because a Canterbury Bill of a similar nature was about to follow. He did not think those remarks found an echo in the breasts of many honorable members in the Council. He could appeal to honorable members to say whether on former occasions he had not always advocated the principle upon which this Bill was based—that in its lands the colony had a source of revenue which should be made to contribute to the cost of constructing large public works and harbours. He supported the Riverton and Wanganni Harbour Bills when they were brought before the Council, and when there was no question of any similar Bill affecting his part of the colony being introduced. He could only say that his honorable friend, in imputing such motives, did great injustice to him, but still greater injustice to himself. The honorable gentleman stated that this was a purely local matter, and yet, almost in the next breath, he went on to say that the Bill was to be followed up by other similar measures, and that the policy that ought to be pursued was a national policy. If this Bill would develop the resources of one portion of the colony, and if other similar Bills would develop the resources of other parts of the colony, did not that constitute a national policy? Was not that developing the resources of the various parts of the colony? It seemed to him that that was truly a national policy, and he said most positively that he wished for no other. It was also argued that they were doing an injustice to the public creditor; that the Crown lands of the colony would be swallowed up by making railways out of the public estate. He had already pointed out that in this particular district they were proposing to take only 400,000 acres out of an available area of 6,000,000 acres; and he would ask the Council whether the increased value which would be given to the remaining lands of the district would not in itself be far greater than the cost of the railway. But, as a matter of assets, the honorable gentlemen spoke as if they were going to take the proceeds of that land and throw it into the sea, whereby they would be so much the poorer. What would, in reality, be the position of the matter? If they spent £500,000 or £800,000 on this work, if it was spent wisely and well the railway itself would be an asset for themselves and for the public creditor. In fact they would be much the richer, because not only had they the increased value of the land, but they had the railway, which ought to produce a very considerable revenue. It would not only pay itself, but it would help, as all these branch railways would, to make the other railways pay. It would be a very important feeder to the main lines which were already in the course of construction, if not already completed, and it might in some cases make all the difference between those lines being worked at a profit or at a loss. He felt, with regard to this point, that the more they discussed the matter, the better the principle for which he contended would be understood. Therefore he did not complain of the argument of the honorable gentleman. The Hon. Dr. Grace stated,—and the remark was repeated by several other honorable members,—that this was a Bill which should emanate from the Government of the day. He was not at all prepared to dispute that. No doubt this was a Bill which should, under ordinary circumstances, come to the Council recommended by the Government; but he would point out that it was actually recommended by the Government. The Colonial Secretary showed that the Government had given the matter considerable attention, and that the Bill was recommended by the Government. Still, he was willing to allow that it would have been better if this line had formed part of the scheme of the Government. They all knew, however, that the Government had, owing to press of time, not been able to address themselves to a full consideration of this subject, and the question arose whether, if a private member showed that the construction of a particular railway would assist to develop the resources of an important part of the colony, the Council should refuse to consider the matter. He thought, under all the circumstances, that it would not be wise to reject the Bill on that account. The Hon. Mr. Menzies objected to his argument that one great benefit from this line was that it would increase the value of the land through which the railway would run. The honorable gentleman said it was well known that the land would increase in value even where there was no railway—that the lapse of time and the growth of settlement would give it an enhanced value; but surely their experience told them that a railway would double and even quadruple the value of the land. He did not deny that land did increase in value without a railway; but it was indisputable that the increase would be far greater where there was a railway. The honorable gentleman also said that the Bill gave too much power to the trust that was to be constituted; but he (Mr. Hall) had already said that he was willing to withdraw that part of the Bill. The Hon. Mr. Peacock remarked that they ought to husband the land—that they were parting with it too freely; and he was supported in that view by the Hon. Mr. Buckley: but that argument had come rather unfortunately from two gentlemen from the Province of Canterbury, where the land was actually being sold as quickly as they could get people to buy it. It might be the case in Canterbury that the Crown lands were being got rid of too rapidly, but he did not think that could be said of Otago, where the land had been too much held back. He knew for a fact that some of the large purchases that had been made in Canterbury had been made by settlers who came from Otago, because they could not obtain land there. The same remark would apply to Southland, where the system of free selection prevailed. His honorable friend Sir F. Dillon Ball said, substantially, that the application of the Land Fund to the development of the waste lands should not be confined to one part of the colony. He quite agreed with that. He did not think anything had ever fallen from him which would imply the contrary opinion. He would be glad to support a proposal of the kind coming from any part of the colony, if it could be shown that it was a prudent proposal and likely to produce a satisfactory result. Then his honorable friend said, "What are we to do in those portions of the colony where the waste lands have already been sold, or where there is no land to sell?" He submitted, first, that a more urgent plea existed for measures of this kind where there were great quantities of Crown land unsold. Those were the districts where this principle should be first applied: but he did not mean to say that lands already sold should go without railway communication. We had entered into a scheme of public works, and we must go through with it prudently and carefully, and we could not see one part of the country enjoying all the facilities of railway communication which others were obliged to go without. It was quite true that we could not in some parts of the colony make railways from the proceeds of the land. There we must do it out of loan; and surely that was an additional reason why we should make railways out of the proceeds of the land where possible, and not add to the indebtedness of the colony except for works in those parts of the country which were not so well off in respect to waste land. The colony would need all its credit to enable it to make railways where there was no land to sell. The honorable gentleman had made some remarks upon the general financial position of the colony, and had referred to a necessity, in his opinion, for generalizing the Land Fund. He (Mr. Hall) did not mean to say that the time might not be approaching when the system established in 1856 must be reconsidered. He was one of the few remaining of those members who were parties to the inauguration of that system, and he thought it was a fair arrangement, and, moreover, that it had been productive of great advantage to the colony; but, at the same time, he was not prepared to deny that present circumstances necessitated some further consideration of the matter. But he hoped honorable members would consider this: that, if there was to be a generalization, they must ask themselves, "What is the Land Fund?" In Otago the land is sold at £1 per acre, in Canterbury at £2, in other places at 10s., and in some places even as low as 5s. Could the Land Fund be generalized to this extent: to take from the people of Canterbury not only the pound they gave for the land, but the other pound they paid on the distinct understanding that it should be spent in making roads? That was the reason why £2 was paid—because in Canterbury they thought it right and wise to raise from the proceeds of the sales of land sufficient funds to make the land accessible; therefore he hoped this aspect of the question would be considered. There must be a consideration of the fact that a larger amount was paid in Canterbury for the same article than was paid in other parts of the colony.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN.—Not the same article.

The Hon. Mr. HALL was not aware whether the Hon. Mr. Chamberlin had that intimate acquaintance with any part of the colony besides Auckland which would entitle him to contradict the statement he (Mr. Hall) had made. Did the honorable gentleman know what kind of land was being sold for £2 an acre in Canterbury? He ventured to say that the honorable gentleman had no more idea of it than he had of what the land in the moon was worth. He would be quite surprised at some of the land for which £2 an acre was paid in Canterbury: he could not have any idea of the quality of the land which brought that price.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN.—Yes, I have.

The Hon. Mr. HALL ventured to differ from his honorable friend, for he was sure that if he did know he would not have made that remark.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN might be allowed to explain what he meant. The difference between the Canterbury land and land in the North Island was this: that in Canterbury a person might put his plough into the ground immediately he purchased it, and in a few months after have a crop of wheat, &c.; whereas land in the North Island was so thoroughly covered with forest, bush, and scrub that it cost £5 or £6 an acre to put it into a condition to obtain anything at all from it.

The Hon. Mr. HALL thought his honorable friend was labouring under a delusion. However, he would not proceed to discuss the question any further. The only other remark he wished to make was this: His honorable friend the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell had referred to the perfunctory character of the estimates of the cost of the railway placed before the Committee. Although he (Mr. Hall) admitted that the surveys at present made were not such as the Government would be justified in accepting and acting upon, still they had the opinions of Mr. Blair, an engineer of acknowledged eminence, of the Surveyor-General, of Mr. McKerrow, and others; and he ventured to suggest that the Council could not expect much more definite opinions in the present stage of this work. Although he felt sorry that the Council did not feel inclined to read the Bill a second time, because he thought it a good measure, still he should not object to the Bill being referred to the Select Committee.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

The Council adjourned at five minutes past twelve o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 13th November, 1877.

Buller River—Armed Constabulary—Land Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

BULLER BRIDGE.

Mr. BAIGENT asked the Government, If they will make provision for the erection of a bridge over the Buller River, where it crosses the main line of road from Nelson to Reefton? At present, owing to the absence of a bridge over the river, it was most dangerous to travel from Nelson to Reefton. It frequently happened that it took a week to make the journey.

Mr. LARNACH might state, for the information of the honorable gentleman, that the Government intended to make inquiries in reference to this matter, and would be able to deal with the question in a few days.

ARMED CONSTABULARY.

Mr. GISBORNE asked the Minister in charge of the Defence Force, On what terms, as to notice and otherwise, the reductions in the Armed Constabulary Force were made during last recess? If there was any rule in force under which notice was given to the persons who had been discharged from the Armed Constabulary Force, he would like to know what it was.

Mr. SHEEHAN said that the members of the Armed Constabulary Force had no claim to notice or to compensation in the event of their being discharged, but when the force was reduced each officer received a gratuity equal to four months' pay, and each private got one month's pay.

LAND BILL.

This Bill was further considered in Committee.

Clause 98.—Rent of runs in Canterbury assessed on carrying capacity.

Mr. LUMSDEN moved, That, in the words "nor less than ninepence for every head of sheep," the word "ninepence" be struck out, with a view to insert the words "one shilling."

Question put, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

RIVERTON HARBOUR.

The Hon. Mr. NURSE asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, if the Government will detail an engineer to confer with the Riverton Harbour Board, to inquire into and report generally what improvements are requisite to turn the harbour to the best account; also to draw up plans and specifications for such improvements? He had been induced to ask this question by the excellent advice he received when the Riverton Harbour Bill was before the Council. Several honorable members had been good enough to suggest that, if proper plans had been prepared, as in the case of the Bluff Harbour Bill, the Riverton Harbour Bill would have had a better chance of passing. It was quite impossible for the Riverton Harbour Board, in the present state of its funds, to get plans prepared. The fees were all expended in paying the pilot, and they could not even keep the wharf in order. All they could do was to fall back upon the Government, and ask them to assist in preparing plans.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that Mr. Blackett, the Marine Engineer, was going down south, and he would receive instructions to assist the Harbour Board, and to report generally upon what was requisite to improve the harbour. With reference to drawing up plans and specifications, the honorable gentleman must be aware that, if it was to be considered part of the duty of the Government to undertake such work for all proposed harbour improvements, which might not afterwards be approved of, very considerable addition must be made to the already large staff of the Public Works Department. With respect to that point, the Harbour Board must do as other Harbour Boards did, and procure plans for themselves.

MOKAU DISTRICT.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he had learned from private sources that such a report as he moved for had been recently addressed to the Government. He thought it would be interesting to the Council if laid on the table, in case it should contain any information as to the state of the Native mind in that district. He was informed that there was also another interesting point adverted to in the report—namely, that the coast at Mokau and the neighbourhood was subsiding at a remarkably rapid rate. He was anxious, for other than political reasons, to get access to such information as the Government might have on that point.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid upon the table copies of any report recently received by the Government relative to the Mokau District."—(Hon. Mr. Mantell.)

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said there could be no doubt such a report would be of great interest to the Council and to the Government if it were in existence. Although he had no reason to dispute the accuracy of the honorable gentleman's information that such a report was addressed to the Government, the result of his inquiries was that no such report had been received by the Government.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought a little further research would enable the honorable gentleman, with the aid of his colleague, the Minister for Native Affairs, to obtain the report. Of course, if no such report existed, the motion could have no effect, but he believed that the report had not only been sent to the Government, but had been acknowledged by the Government.

Motion agreed to.

CHRISTCHURCH CITY RESERVES BILL.

The Hon. Mr. HALL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to vest in the Corporation of Christchurch certain portions of land in the city for the management of which no sufficient provision now existed. First of all, there were Cranmer, Latimer, and a part of Cathedral Squares. The Corporation had been advised that they had no sufficient power over those squares to enable them to enclose and plant them and lay them out as ornamental gardens. One object of the Bill was to give them that power. It proposed to do much the same with reference to certain unoccupied portions of the banks of the River Avon. At present there were strips of land along the River Avon which, if they were placed under the charge of the Corporation and planted as gardens, would add very much to the enjoyment of the people of Christchurch. There were also a variety of triangular pieces of ground formed by the intersection of various streets, which were now merely vacant spaces under nobody's control—they were practically "no man's land." The Bill proposed to vest these portions of land in the Corporation, with the right to erect ornamental buildings on them, to construct water-tanks on some, and use others for cab stands; but they were not to be let, and none of the buildings were to be made a source of pecuniary profit. The Bill also proposed to vest the Market-place of Christchurch in the Corporation. Although the Corporation now exercised a certain authority over a portion of it, there was considerable doubt as to their power to do so effectually. The 5th clause vested in the Corporation one of those strips of land on the river-side to which he had alluded for the purpose of a fire brigade station. On part of the land the Corporation had already built a fire brigade station, and, strictly speaking, that was an encroachment, but practically it was not a grievance to the inhabitants. He proposed to make an addition to the 2nd clause of the Bill, stating that Cranmer, Latimer, and Cathedral Squares were handed over to the Corporation, subject to such roads and streets as now legally existed. He understood that in the original plan of the City of Christchurch there were streets laid off across some of those squares. The squares were now fenced in, and the fencing had not been opposed; but, when it was proposed to vest the squares absolutely in the City Council, the residents in the neighbourhood objected, and, he thought, reasonably, that it might be absolutely stopping up the right of road which legally existed. He proposed, therefore, to insert an addition in Committee which would save that right.

The Hon. Captain FRASER would like to know if these reserves were Crown-granted. This property was worth, he supposed, £100,000. Last year, when he proposed to give to the University the reversion of the Drillsheaf Reserve in Dunedin, the Hon. Dr. Pollen objected. Would that honorable gentleman make any opposition now to giving land of the value of £100,000 to the Corporation of Christchurch?

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said there was a general objection to Bills of this character, which he stated in Committee on the previous night. That objection was, that the habit had been, and the disposition was constantly shown, to deprive the Colonial Government of every inch of land that it was possible to take away from it in the towns and townships of the colony. The consequence was that, whenever the Government required a piece of land as a site for any necessary or useful purpose, they had to go into the market and buy back, at a largely enhanced price, in many cases, the very land which was unwisely granted in the manner proposed by this Bill. He did not know whether the objection was a valid one in this case, or whether there remained, as he hoped there did remain, a sufficient extent of land in Christchurch in the possession of the Crown to provide for the public wants of the colony in future. If that were settled satisfactorily, he thought it was exceedingly desirable that land in the position which the honorable gentleman described should be enjoyed and controlled by the Municipality.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK said there was a large quantity of land in the possession of the Government in Christchurch. None of the land referred to in the Bill, excepting the squares and Market-place, was suitable for a building of any kind. These pieces of land had been reserved for the City of Christchurch for all time, and he imagined it was through neglect that the reserves had not been made over before. In fact, the Provincial Council on one or two occasions offered to give a reserve to the City Council, but wanted to make conditions for fencing, and so forth, which the City Council did not think they were in a position to carry out at the time. The bulk of the land referred to consisted of small pieces, many of which were now planted, and the citizens of Christchurch were very anxious that these places should be reserved, and that no buildings should be erected on them.

The Hon. Major RICHMOND would like to ask the Hon. Colonel Whitmore if the land described in the Third Schedule was the same land that was originally appropriated for a market-place.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT said all the land mentioned in the schedule had been vested in the municipal body for a long time. The object of the Bill was merely to prevent these spots, with the exception of the Market-place, from being built upon and so destroying the appearance of the city. Hitherto they had been preserved from buildings, but there was recently a movement on the part of the Municipal Council to build on some of the land, but the inhabitants offered great opposition. The whole of the pieces of land contained in the schedule had already been made over to the municipal body, and this Bill was only necessary to prevent the squares from being disfigured with buildings. He thought the Council would find that the Municipality were in legal possession of this property.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE presumed that when the Public Reserves Bill came into operation a great many Bills of this kind would be unnecessary. With regard to what the Hon. Dr. Pollen said as to the absolute necessity of reserving some places for the General Government, he thought that, if the Public Reserves Bill were passed, they need not fear the contingency which the honorable gentleman suggested, because power would be given to the Government to reserve any lands which might be required for such purposes without paying an exorbitant price.

The Hon. Mr. HALL said the objection raised by the Hon. Captain Fraser was based on a misapprehension. There was no necessity to hand over any of the reserves to the Corporation, as they were in the hands of the Municipality at present. It was only necessary to give them effectual possession and power to manage those reserves. The Hon. Dr. Pollen objected to reserves being granted away which the Colonial Government might require for building purposes. He quite agreed with the honorable gentleman, but the objection did not apply to the present case, because there was not one of those reserves on which the Colonial Government would have the slightest right to build. The Colonial Government had been very liberally dealt with in Christchurch. The Provincial Government handed over to the General Government, for building purposes, land for which they paid £10,000 in hard cash. That was an excess of generosity, and he doubted whether it would be reciprocated.

THAMES WATER SUPPLY BILL.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was introduced into the House of Representatives by one of the members who represented the Thames District, and, in compliance with a request made to him, he had undertaken to take charge of it in the Council. Honorable gentlemen would remember that an Act was passed last session by which a Committee was constituted to manage the water-works that supplied Grahamstown and Shortland, the chief town of the Thames Diggings. That Committee consisted of eight members, five of whom were chosen by the Borough Council of the Thames, and one each by the Waitohi, Parawai, and Kauaeranga Highway Boards. The history of the water supply which this Committee was to manage was this: The supply was first provided, the pipes were laid, a reservoir was built, and the water brought into the town for the use of the inhabitants by the Provincial Government. It was then transferred by the Provincial Government to the Thames District, and the Committee which he had just described was constituted by the Act of last year for the purpose of managing it. The Act gave to the Committee certain borrowing powers, as was usual in such cases, but they were not of a very extensive character, the amount being £2,000, and the rate of interest 8 per cent. It was now found that the water supply provided by these works was not sufficient for the wants of the inhabitants. There was another water supply, which the liberality of the colony in the early days of the Public Works scheme provided for the Thames, at a cost of some £120,000, by which water was also brought into the town; but that supply appeared to be under the control and management of the County Council of the Thames, and there was a certain amount of rivalry, which was not entirely of a friendly character, between the County Council and the Borough Council of the Thames on several matters of local interest, amongst which was, unfortunately, this question of the water supply. The Borough Council were exceedingly anxious to have their own supply, or the means of supplying the town by their own machinery, extended; and the object of this Bill was to give them that power. The 2nd clause proposed to alter the 26th and 28th sections of the Act of last year. By the first of those sections the Committee were authorized to borrow any sum not exceeding £2,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 8 per cent., and by the other section it was provided that the money so borrowed should be repayable within five years—that the loan should not have a currency beyond that time. The Committee had found that it would not be possible for them to get the money they required upon the terms specified in the Act of last year, and the proposition now was that, instead of the words “eight,” “two,” and “five,” which referred respectively to the interest on the loan, its amount, and its currency, the word “ten” should be substituted: that was to say, that the Borough Council might be authorized to pay 10 per cent. for the money, to increase the amount to £10,000, and to make the currency of the loan ten years. The other amendment proposed to be made by the 2nd clause, to erase certain words in the Act of last year referring to the form of coupon, was necessary inasmuch as there was no such form. The object of the 3rd clause of the Bill was to place the Waterworks Committee in the same position as regarded the power of taking land for public purposes as the Committee would be in if it were a Borough Council or a Highway Board under the provisions of the Second Part of the Public Works Act. If the Council agreed to the powers proposed to be given to the Committee for enabling them to obtain the means of extending the waterworks, this power in the 3rd clause would also be necessary, because, under the present circumstances, they would have no power to take land or water for their requirements under the provisions of the Second Part of the Public Works Act. He begged to move, That the Bill be read a second time.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said that this Bill was only equalled in audacity by another Bill to which the same gentleman's name was attached, which had been on their Order Paper for a very long time, and which was likely to remain there until the end of the session. Last year they passed a Thames Water Supply Act, an Act of thirty-seven clauses and a schedule, and they gave a great deal of attention to that measure.

Hon. Dr. Pollen

Now this wretched thing was brought in with three clauses, which recast the whole of the previous Act. The Assembly last year gave the Thames Water Committee power to borrow £2,000 at 8 per cent., the debentures to be redeemed in five years; and now what did this Bill say? That, instead of £2,000, they should have the power to borrow £10,000, that the rate of interest should be increased from 8 per cent. to 10 per cent., and the currency of the loan extended from five to ten years. The whole Act of last year was recast, and the last clause of this Bill proposed to apply the provisions of the Public Works Act. He would endeavour to put a stop to this sort of thing altogether, and would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT said the only objection he had to this Bill, which he regarded as a very fair one, especially as its object was to facilitate the supply of one of the main elements of life, was in reference to the percentage. Surely this body could borrow money for less than 10 per cent., which appeared to him to be a very high rate. All these public bodies generally raised money at 6 or 7 per cent., and certainly at not more than 7 per cent. If it were a fair and honest transaction, he should think that the money could be borrowed for a very much less sum than 10 per cent. He thought that the Bill was a fair one; it was, he presumed, for the purpose of bringing water into the town, and he would never oppose such a legitimate object as that.

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMSON said it was evident that the town to which this Bill referred was not a southern town, or else it would possess such endowments as would enable it to go into the market and borrow money on reasonable terms. It was quite true that the rate of interest was very high, but the rate of interest was generally regulated by the security which could be offered. Now, it unfortunately happened with regard to the Thames that it had not been endowed as many other towns in the colony had been, and therefore the security which it had to offer was not sufficient to enable it to obtain money on such favourable terms as other more fortunate towns obtained. He had been informed by people from the Thames that the works were very much required; and the terms specified in the Bill were the only terms upon which the money could be raised, unless the Thames people applied to the Assembly, as had been done in other cases, for a large endowment with which to go into the money market to borrow. There was the case of the Bluff Harbour, in which an endowment of 35,000 acres was given, with a right to borrow £50,000; and 15,000 acres were also asked for for the Riverton Harbour. It was quite clear that if endowments were not asked for they would not be given. Here was a township endeavouring to supply its own wants, and willing to pay a high rate of interest, and yet its action was characterized as infamous and iniquitous.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said he did not so characterize it.

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMSON thought the honorable gentleman called the Bill a most iniquitous one: if he was mistaken he begged the honorable gentleman's pardon. The present proposal of the Thames people displayed a disposition on their part to help themselves, even although they had to pay an exceptionally high rate of interest.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that the honorable gentleman who had just sat down had called attention to the circumstance that there were no endowments provided in this Bill, but in illustrating his argument the honorable gentleman should have shown that there were already waterworks in the other Island, or in any part of the country, which had been assisted by endowments. He thought the honorable gentleman would find that this Bill was of just that class of semi-private Bills in which there were no endowments. He did not pay much attention to the difficulty about the rate of interest. They had already this session passed one Bill, if not more, in which that rate of interest was allowed, and it was no use giving a borrowing power and attaching a rate of interest which would preclude the raising of the money that was wanted. He presumed the promoters of this Bill had ascertained that 10 per cent. was the lowest rate at which they could get the money, or that possibly they would have to pay as much as that. It was obvious that the cheaper they could get the money the better, and they no doubt apprehended that they might have to pay as much as 10 per cent. Well, unless honorable members were prepared to say that a Bill for a purpose of this kind was to be rejected, and that the people of the Thames were not to have facilities for washing themselves, they ought not to stick at such a point as that of the rate of interest, especially as the people were perfectly willing to pay the high rate that seemed to be necessary. He should support this Bill without reference to the gentleman's name which happened to be affixed to it—a gentleman with whom he was not at all acquainted. He did not think that the circumstance of the name at the head of a Bill should influence honorable members in considering it, if it were otherwise unobjectionable.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL thought the last speaker had not done justice to the argument of the Hon. Mr. Williamson. As he understood the argument which the Hon. Mr. Williamson used, it was a fair and legitimate one. That honorable member said that Southern members were bringing forward Bill after Bill to grant large endowments of land in aid of such works; but that members from the North Island did not do so, for the simple reason that they had no land there to give. If the Thames community were living in a district where there was plenty of available Crown lands to be dealt with, and where there were people willing to invest large sums of money in land, that community would not now have to ask leave to borrow money at a high rate of interest for the purpose of obtaining a water supply. He looked with a great deal of admiration at the modesty which members representing districts in the North Island had shown in this matter of endowments; because, looking at the millions of acres which had been bought, or, he should perhaps say, pretended to be bought, out of the moneys that had been laid aside by the liberality of Parliament for the acquisition of Native land in the North Island, he did not see why the opportunity should not be taken by members representing the interests of the North to make large endowments and reserves out of those lands, even if the acquisition of the Native title should not at the present moment have placed any very valuable land at their disposal. He should have been very glad himself to have seen the Thames District, which contained an industrious population, and which had contributed largely to the wealth of the colony, assisted by endowments of land for municipal and for other public purposes, which would have enabled the people to do a great deal better for themselves than they had been able to do in the few years they had been settled there.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON asked if the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell would mention any Corporation in the colony that had been endowed with land for the purpose of obtaining a water supply.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL had not said there had been any such endowment. What he had pointed out was that the necessity for such endowments had not arisen in the rich communities of the South, whose wealth had been created by the possession of a vast extent of territory, a boon which the people in the North had never obtained.

The Hon. Mr. HALL chiefly rose to speak on the general question of endowments. The Bill itself was a good Bill. There were several points which they would have to consider in Committee, but there had been no arguments adduced to justify the Council in refusing to read the Bill a second time. He wished to point out to the Hon. Mr. Williamson that it was not the case that all Municipal Corporations in the South were richly endowed. The Corporation of Christchurch had no endowments whatever except the 2,000 acres authorized to be given to all Corporations by the Act of last session, and they had to rate themselves very highly indeed for whatever improvements they carried out. They had formerly got occasional grants from the Provincial Government, but that had been the only addition they had received to their own revenue. Neither was it the case that the Corporations in the North Island were altogether without endowments. If he was not mistaken, the Corporation of the City of Auckland possessed endowments which in the course of time would be exceedingly valuable, and they would be infinitely better off than the Corporation of the city to which he had referred. The Corporation of Wellington also had endowments which, in a few years, would make it one of the wealthiest cities in New Zealand. Therefore he thought his honorable friend Mr. Williamson was not altogether borne out by facts in the comparison he drew.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES did not think that they could do anything better calculated to be of service to a community than to enable them to obtain an abundant supply of pure water. They ought by every means in their power to give special encouragement to those who were desirous of making every exertion they could in order to obtain this first necessary of life. All the community in this case asked was to have larger borrowing powers than were given to them in the Act which this Bill proposed to amend. It seemed to him that honorable members would act very improperly indeed if they withheld the additional power which the people of the Thames required in order to obtain an abundant supply of pure water. They knew very well, from instances that had occurred in other parts of the country, that where the supply ran short the quality of the water became inferior, and the uniform and inevitable result of a short supply of water, of bad quality, was serious disease and probably very heavy mortality. He wondered that his honorable friend who had moved the amendment had forgotten that, under exactly similar circumstances, only three years ago, he applied for similar powers to be given to a community in the South. The honorable gentleman then moved in the Council the second reading of a Bill for enabling the community of Cromwell to construct waterworks, and honorable gentlemen would doubtless remember that the necessity for supplying that community with pure water was proved by the portentous mortality which occurred some time before from typhoid fever, caused by the use of impure water. His honorable friend ought to have remembered that case, and to have considered that any other community, even though it was in the North, might be under circumstances which rendered it quite as necessary for them to obtain a supply of pure water as was the case in regard to Cromwell. Nothing could have exceeded the necessity which existed at that time for a water supply to Cromwell, as any one who referred to the debates would perceive, and the same result would follow as certainly as day followed night if in any community the supply of water became impure and scanty. Although other districts had received assistance in the way of endowments, he did not think that it should in any way tell disparagingly against them. He would willingly support the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped the result of passing the Act would be such as to enable the Thames community to obtain a supply of pure water.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said that, as the opinion of the Council was against his amendment, he would beg leave to withdraw it.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY thought that, as this seemed to be an exceptional case, the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill should have given them more information. Under the Municipal Corporations Act the Thames Municipality had power to provide themselves with waterworks, and he would like to know why the Municipality did not do so. No doubt this Committee could not borrow money so advantageously as the Municipality.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said his honorable friend Captain Fraser was not infrequently distinguished by an impulsiveness which was quite of a youthful character, and he was also distinguished by an instability of opinion which was not uncommonly characteristic of such a disposition as that which he had attributed to the honorable gentleman. He had just pronounced himself very strongly against this Bill, and in his censure he included another Bill, using a very strong expression with regard to it, and forgetting, apparently, that the very Bill which he condemned in such unmeasured terms was one of which he undertook himself to move the second reading. He did not know whether the honorable gentleman had changed his opinion with respect to the object of the Bill or with respect to the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Rowe) since that time. The history of this water supply he had endeavoured to give in the clearest possible way. Since the Thames City was first founded, it grew up with very great rapidity. The soil was an old sea-beach, very porous and shelly. The water supply for a very large number of inhabitants—amounting to 6,000 or 7,000—was obtained from wells sunk in this porous soil, and even in those wells the supply of water in a dry season was very uncertain indeed. Consequently there was a great deal of sickness and mortality, and a great deal of domestic discomfort. After that condition of things had continued for some time, the Auckland Provincial Government, in the midst of its poverty—and it was a work which he always remembered with gratitude to that Government—provided a water supply of a very small but perfect character. They constructed a reservoir about two or three miles out of the town, and from that reservoir they laid pipes through the streets. Most happily they did that, because the next summer was so dry that but for this supply the town must have been decimated by scarlatina, which broke out. This water supply was the property of the Provincial Government. The persons who were interested in the water supply lived within the limits of the Thames Borough proper, within the limits of the Parawai District Board, the Waitohi Highway Board, and the Kaueranga Highway Board. It was therefore felt that it would not be right to give to the Thames Municipal Council proper, or to any other of those local bodies, exclusive power and control over these waterworks. Consequently a Committee was formed, elected by all the local bodies who were interested in the water supply, and by an Act that Committee got the power of managing the waterworks. The Committee had no property but the plant itself and whatever revenue was authorized to be raised by the sale of the water. It was found that the present supply was not sufficient for the wants of the district, and what was now desired was increased means of extending the plant, and the power of taking land above the present reservoir, so that they might get a larger head of water. To do all this they found that the sum of £2,000 which they were originally authorized to borrow was not sufficient, that the time within which they were required to repay it was too short, and that the interest authorized to be paid for the advance by the Bill of last year was not such as, under the circumstances, would induce capitalists to lend money, there being no security in the way of land. Under these circumstances, they could not be expected to get money on the same terms as the Municipal Corporation, or any other body having large endowments. The Corporation had the power of raising funds, but the works were kept out of the hands of the Borough Council because there were so many other bodies interested. It was the duty of the Committee to do their best to keep up the supply of water, and to increase it as the wants of the community increased. That was the sole object of the Bill. They found they wanted £10,000. They found they could not get the money at 8 per cent., and when they got it it must stand over for ten years instead of five years. There could be no colonial liability, and the only persons concerned were those interested in the waterworks.

The Hon. Captain FRASER rose to make a personal explanation. Mr. Rowe asked him to take charge of the Gold Mining Districts Bill. He read the Bill, and he then said he could not take charge of it. The Hon. Mr. Bonar was then asked to take charge of it, and he consented. When the Hon. Mr. Bonar went away, he said to him (Captain Fraser), "You had better move the second reading." If he did, he would simply state the contents of the Bill, because he could not ask the Council to pass the second reading.

CROWN REDRESS BILL No. 2.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he hoped the Hon. Mr. Hall would assist him, as that honorable gentleman had already called attention to the circumstance that great hardship occurred to individuals through their not being able to sue the Crown in the event of damage from railways. There were other cases of inconvenience which, honorable gentlemen were probably quite aware, continually occurred in all parts of the country from the awkward state of the law as regarded actions against the Crown. In the Act of 1871 there was a reference to the Act of Edward II., so that it was proposed to repeal what was evidently a very old system. A case occurred not very long ago which showed the great injustice done to private individuals at the present time. A vessel named the "Kate Monaghan," with a cargo of iron, was wrecked; the wreck was purchased by a private individual; he saved a quantity of iron from the wreck, and sold it to the Government. The Government refused to pay. Although he understood the insurance companies would have been quite willing to pay the insurance, the Government argued that there was no salvage against the Crown. That case brought forward the monstrous injustice of the present state of the law. As the law now stood, no person could, except by permission, sue the Crown. The Petition of Rights was only a remnant of barbarous times, and, especially in a country where so much of the business of the country was done by the Government, it ought to be abandoned. The Bill really asserted nothing else. If, in Committee, any objection were raised on the ground that inferior Courts should not be included, he would be prepared to give way, although he supposed the same principle ought to apply. There was a proviso in clause 3 that nothing in the Act was to affect claims for damages for breach of contract in reference to the waste lands of the Crown. There had already, in the Public Works Bill, been a recognition of this principle in the acceptance by the Government of the position of public carriers, and in England there had also been several approaches to this alteration.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES was afraid this Bill would lead to litigation, which there was not the least doubt would be very prejudicial to the Crown. If this Bill passed, a great many speculative lawsuits would be the result. Then, again, there was always a prejudice against the Government. A Government or a company was fair game. In Australia there was a large monetary institution that would scarcely go to law under any circumstances, because an action was bound to go against them. If that were the case with a bank, what would it be with a Government? He had no hesitation in saying that the result of the Bill, if it became law, would be prejudicial to the public interest. He had known cases where verdicts were given against the Government where he was sure that the result would have been reversed had a private individual been sued. Before the door was opened to litigation and to instituting actions of a frivolous character, he thought that it would be well for the Council to pause. For example, in connection with railways, the burning of a gorse fence, or the killing of sheep or cattle on the line, might result in an action for a small amount, but the law costs might amount to a large sum. When travelling on the railway lately in Canterbury, he saw several sheep killed. He dared say that, if this Bill were in force, that would result in an action, and a heavy legal bill. Therefore he thought that this Bill, although a small one, involved large consequences to the Government of the country. They had been able to get on very well hitherto without such an Act, and his impression was that they could get on very well without it for some time to come. The giving of too many facilities for litigation was certainly not an advantage to the Government, and he doubted whether it would be an advantage to the community.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN was very glad the Hon. Mr. Holmes had called the attention of the Council to the character of this Bill. He had not been without hope that they would have had the advice of the Hon. Mr. Hart regarding such a very important change in the law as was proposed to be effected by this Bill. In order that the attention of the Council might be given to the Bill, to its operation and probable effects, he would now move, That the debate be adjourned. It was impossible to overrate the importance of this Bill, or, without very great care, to see the operation and effect of it. If its title were "A Bill to promote Litigation" it would probably be much more representative of its character than its present title.

Debate adjourned.

EDUCATION RESERVES BILL.

This Bill was further considered in Committee.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES moved, That the following new clause be added to the Bill:—
 "The Governor in Council may, at any time after the expiry of the current leases, on twelve months' notice being given to any lessee of any portion of any education reserve, other than a reserve for a university, by Proclamation, declare such reserve or any part thereof open for sale by auction under the waste lands laws in force in the provincial district in which such reserve is situated; but all proceeds arising from the sale of any such reserve shall be received by the School Commissioners of the district within which such reserve is situated, and held in trust for investment on real security or in Government or municipal debentures issued in the colony; and the income, interest, and profits arising from such investment shall be dealt with in manner provided in section twenty-one."

Question put, "That the proposed new clause stand part of the Bill;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

AYES.

Mr. Hall,	Mr. Nurse,

OMARU-NASEBY RAILWAY.

Mr. HISLOP asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Government will make provision for recouping to the local bodies the expenses incurred by them in the survey of the Oamaru-Naseby line of railway? He might state that the Municipal Council of Oamaru and other local bodies interested had gone to considerable expense in surveying this line of railway, and the report of their engineers had been adopted by the Government, thereby saving the Government a good deal of expense. He wished to know whether those local bodies would be recouped the outlay which they had incurred.

Mr. LARNACH replied that the Government would cause inquiries to be made in order to ascertain whether the Government had committed itself in any way to the survey of this line of railway, and if so, they would give the matter proper consideration.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. STAFFORD asked the Premier, Whether there is any foundation for the statement circulated in the colonial Press, on the authority of "our own correspondents," to the effect that officers of the Civil Service of New Zealand were placing difficulties in the way of the present Government obtaining information as to the public affairs of the colony? The House would recognize that it was highly desirable that the country should know whether the Civil Service had got into such a state that any of its officers would refuse to afford any information to the Ministry of the day, whoever they might be. For himself, he could hardly believe that there was any foundation for such reports as had been circulated, and he thought it was desirable that there should be a most authentic statement made as to whether such reports were justifiable or not.

Sir G. GREY replied that the reports published in the newspapers were not made in any way by the authority of the Government, and it must therefore decline to notice them.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. STAFFORD asked the Colonial Treasurer, When he will make his Financial Statement?

Mr. LARNACH said there was a considerable amount of private business on the Order Paper which it would be desirable to get through, in order to send it to the other Chamber; but he should be prepared on Monday next, at half-past seven o'clock, to make his Financial Statement. In giving that promise he presumed the House would understand that it was conditional on not being interrupted in any way by any action of honorable members contingent upon the threat made by the honorable member for Egmont the other evening that he would not allow any business to proceed. Of course, if he was not interrupted, and if he received fair-play from the House, he would carry out his desire of bringing down the Financial Statement at the time he named, and he trusted he would receive that consideration from the House which such an important matter deserved.

NORTH OF AUCKLAND WORKS.

Sir R. DOUGLAS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he felt some diffidence in introducing this motion to the consideration of the House, the more so because it referred to the voting of several sums of money, and to votes which had lapsed. He would not take up the time of the House by making a long speech on the subject. He would simply point out that there were members of the House who would be able to bear out the statements he had to make in reference to what had passed in another place, and he expected from them that assistance which he should readily accord under similar circumstances. He would ask them to bear witness to the facts which he would adduce. The first item in this notice of motion was for a road from Mangaturoto to Waikekei. That road had been promised for very many years, and it was promised by the late Superintendent of Auckland (Mr. Williamson). It was a road which would open up a very large tract of country. The land near the sea was not very good, but that which lay between Mangaturoto and Waikekei had a good limestone bottom. Every country member who knew what agricultural land was would understand perfectly well that land with a good limestone bottom would be land suitable for agricultural purposes. This £1,000 was proposed to be expended in helping a number of settlers who had been in that district for very many years, and who, when they first went there, were led to suppose that they would have a road formed by which they could send their produce to the market. Notwithstanding the promises that were made to them, they had been obliged, almost up to the present time, to carry everything on their backs, even ploughs, for a distance of from ten to twelve miles, to get them to their homesteads. Seeing these things, and having known the district for some ten years, it grieved him much that these men, many of them with families growing up, who had cast their lot in New Zealand, should be so hardly used, and no assistance given to them. They appealed to him to get them redress for their grievances, and asked him to appeal to the Provincial Council to do them justice and fulfil the promise which had been made to them, which was that they should at any rate have roads to get their produce to market. They said to him, "We have given our lives, our time, and everything to make this colony great and prosperous, and all we ask in return is that you should give us means to get our produce out of the district." One of the honorable members for Franklin could bear him out in saying that for many years this road had been promised to the settlers, and all he asked the House to do now was to carry out that promise, and grant them money to open this road. With regard to the Ruatangata Road, he might say that he was informed by the Chairman of the Ruatangata Road Board that he made some arrangement with the Superintendent of the province by which a new line of road should be opened up, and he appealed to the Superintendent to purchase the necessary land for the road, as it belonged to the Natives. The Superintendent replied that a certain sum of money would be granted for the purpose, if the Board also voted a certain amount. The Board, however, was not a wealthy body, and surely the House did not expect the Road Board of a district of very large area, and with a small amount of capital, to make roads, and also to purchase the land necessary for the purpose. This was especially the case in the present instance. He was informed the road would open up a large tract of country outside the particular district. There was a swamp of 10,000 acres in the district, with a river running through it, which could be made a canal, and there was a very fair fall at one end. If the people of the district could prevail upon some land speculators to purchase and reclaim that swamp, as had been done in the case of the Piako Swamp, instead of being looked on as mere land-sharks there was not a settler in the district who would not welcome them and assist them in every way to open up the land. He believed the settlers would even pay speculators to take the swamp, if they would only reclaim it and open up the land. The land was of the very best quality, being what was known as a raupo swamp, which, as every one of any experience in the colony knew, was the best land for agricultural purposes. It would require some capital to open up this swamp, but, that once done, it would be the means of adding to the people of the colony a large number of that class of settlers whom the House was so anxious to encourage. He meant not very small farmers, but those men who could purchase some 300, 400, or 500 acres of land and work it themselves—a class of settlers who would compare favourably with any other class in New Zealand. With regard to the wharf at Whangarei Heads, he need say little, beyond referring to a resolution passed by the Provincial Council on the subject. The Harbour of Whangarei was very large, and from the township to the Heads was a distance of about fifteen miles. Vessels of large size, even men-of-war, could lie with safety inside, and the channel was about three-quarters of a mile wide; but there was no place at which vessels could lie near the shore. Believing it would be of great advantage to the district to have a wharf at this place, he laid the matter before the Provincial Council, and asked them to put up a wharf at which vessels which were obliged to go to the harbour through stress of weather could lie. The Provincial Council, having fairly discussed his motion, agreed that a wharf should be put up; but in putting the amount on the Estimates a mistake was made, inasmuch as he did not ask for enough. When he came down to the Provincial Council in the following session he asked why the wharf had not been constructed, and he was then told by the Provincial Treasurer, "If you had asked for sufficient money, the wharf would have been erected." He therefore made it his duty to ask for sufficient money. He was no advocate for extravagant expenditure, and consequently he did not put more on the Estimates than was required. It was, however, very desirable that this wharf should be constructed, for it might be found in the future, as it had been in the past, that they would be without means of steam communication to Whangarei township; and, if vessels could only lie alongside a wharf at the Heads, they could take in and discharge cargoes, and do all the necessary work, though of course it would be always desirable to have communication with the township. It was not necessary to go further into the matter at present, and he would therefore merely read an abstract of the address presented by the Provincial Council to the Superintendent "requesting him to expend, out of the first moneys available for public works, a sum of £600 for erecting a wharf at Whangarei Heads." The words, "out of the first moneys available," were added at the suggestion of the Superintendent's Advisers. He (Sir R. Douglas) moved a resolution to this effect:—

"That a respectful address be presented to His Honor the Superintendent requesting him to place on the Estimates a sum of £600 for the purpose of erecting a wharf at Whangarei Heads; also, that a respectful address be presented to His Honor requesting that a sum of £800 be in like manner placed on the Estimates for carrying out the recommendations made by the late Superintendent with reference to a road between Maungakarama and Whangarei."

The Superintendent's representative in the Council then got up and said, "If the honorable member will make it 'out of the first moneys available,' His Honor will accept the motion." The motion was consequently altered and agreed to; and then arose the question, Was the money ever available? A correspondence took place between His Honor and Dr. Pollen on the subject, in which he found Dr. Pollen saying,— authorized to be advanced to the Province of Auckland by 'The Provincial Public Works Advances Act, 1874.'"

"You propose to pay for these works out of the unexpended balance of the sum of £40,000

But that unexpended balance was spent without the vote of the Provincial Council, and in other parts of the province. Under these circumstances, he thought he was justified in asking the House to agree to the amount he had named, seeing that there were already on the Supplementary Estimates several sums of money for other purposes which were to be charged to provincial liabilities. He might go on to explain the whole circumstances of the case, but the plans of the harbour spoke for themselves, and showed undeniably its advantages. Every one could see what sort of harbour this was by looking at the plans to be seen in the library, and could learn from the maps of the district what was the nature of the land in the neighbourhood much better than he could explain it. He next came to the road to Maungakarema, and might say that the remarks he made in regard to the wharf at Whangarei applied to a certain extent to this road, as both works were included in the same motion which he had made in the Provincial Council. He had moved that £800 should be devoted to this work. A public meeting had been held at Whangarei, and the settlers from the Maungakarema District asked that there should be a sum of money devoted to opening up this road. In consequence of applications from the district a report was made by the Provincial Engineer, who said,—

"I have received instructions to have the survey made, and to meet their wishes as far as possible out of the General Government grant for roads and works North, and to report further on the matter. The survey is now being made."

A promise was then made and a resolution passed by the Provincial Council, but from that day to the present time nothing had been done. With regard to the tramway at Kamo, he must appeal to one of the honorable members for the City of Auckland, who, with himself and other members, visited the coal mine at this place, to bear him out in saying that this coal mine, which was worked by working-men, had for years supplied Auckland and the steamers calling at his harbour with coal. Applications had been made by various members of the House to have tramways made in different places, and the Government had done much in the way of opening up railway lines; but not the slightest assistance in any shape or form had been given to this which was one of the finest mineral districts in New Zealand. This coal mine had been worked with a certain amount of advantage by working-men, and not by capitalists, and he ventured to say that the House should in every possible way assist men of this stamp, feeling that it must be a good speculation, because, if it failed, the men, being working-men, must abandon it. That was the best test; for men without capital could not go on working the mine if it did not pay. The sum he mentioned in his motion would not cover the whole cost, but he saw an opportunity of purchasing a tramway which was already made. There was no difficulty as to the purchase, or as to fixing the grades of the line; but the men had not the means, and the county could not afford to lay rails along the tramway. If the tramway could be purchased for this sum of money, the Government would make a very good speculation. The very week they purchased it they could put a charge on the carriage of coal, limestone, and other goods, and it would be willingly and readily paid. There would be no lying out of the money. Interest would be got at once, and, where interest was got for the money on the spot, the House should hardly prevent the outlay of money which would not only return interest immediately, but would do good to a large district. The next item was the Mangapai Wharf, in reference to which the late Superintendent of the province had had a correspondence with the General Government. The recommendation of His Honor was so strong that he need place no further argument before the House in regard to the work. This was a part of what His Honor said,—

"I am still of opinion that these works would be of great public utility, and I should be much obliged by his Excellency the Governor being advised to assent to the expenditure proposed."

The resolution of the Auckland Provincial Council in reference to the subject was as follows:—

"On the motion of Mr. Ormiston, resolved, That a respectful address be presented to His Honor the Superintendent requesting him to place on the Estimates for 1874 a sufficient sum for the erection of a wharf on the Mangapai River, at a place already indicated by the District Engineer, and that the necessary approach be included in such grant."

This wharf would be at the end of the road opening up the district for which he asked the House to grant the sum of £1,000. It would make that road complete. The Premier's recommendation with reference to this bridge was, he thought, sufficient to induce the House to sanction the expenditure.

Mr. DIGNAN had much pleasure in seconding the motion of the honorable and gallant baronet, and could readily indorse every word spoken by the honorable gentleman in relation to it, so far as regarded the Provincial Council of Auckland. That body was always ready and willing to proceed with these works, but the difficulty was solely one of money. A sum of money had been granted by this House for the purposes, amongst others, mentioned by the honorable gentleman; but, instead of handing it over to the late Superintendent for distribution, it was given into the hands of the Northern Native member for the time being, in whose district it was principally spent. At the time the honorable member moved in this matter in the Provincial Council, his greatest grievance was the wharf at Whangarei Heads. The Provincial Government would have proceeded with that work, but it was found, after examination by their engineer, that the estimate then stated by the honorable member was wholly inadequate for the proper construction of the wharf, and, the Provincial Government not having available funds, the next best thing was done—namely, the Superintendent recommended the immediate carrying out of the work to the General Government, more especially as Abolition had in the meantime taken place. But, as regards the truthfulness of the honorable member for Marsden's statements, the necessity for the work, and also the earnest desire and intention of the late Superintendent to carry it out, had means and opportunity been afforded, he (Mr. Dignan) could unhesitatingly testify.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider of an address to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates the following sums for the works set opposite to them respectively: Road from Mangaturoto to Waikakei, £1,000; for opening road at Ruatanga, £300; wharf at Whangarei Heads, £600; road at Maungakarama, £800; tramway at Kamo, £2,000; Mangapai Wharf, say, £800: total, £5,500."—(Sir R. Douglas.)

Mr. J. C. BROWN thought the reasons adduced by the honorable gentleman in favour of the motion were not such as to induce the House to assent to it. He commenced by lecturing the House upon its past proceedings in reference to the Piako Swamp. He also told the House that this work was much required; but he (Mr. Brown) strongly objected to large amounts being spent in a country which the honorable gentleman described as being of little value, and as consisting largely of swamp. As to that portion of the honorable gentleman's argument referring to the settlement of the country, he might say that in the district he had the honor to represent a large proportion of the land had been sold to small settlers at very high rates, and those parties could not get access to their lands for want of roads. He was quite as liberal as other honorable members in the matter of making provision for opening up the interior of the country to settlement, but there were other matters to be considered beyond the voting of money to facilitate settlement in remote districts through valueless country. Some few years ago £60,000 had been voted by this House for roads and bridges north of Auckland, and now they were asked for further sums. In looking over a return placed on the table, he found that 2,000,000 acres in the Province of Auckland realized £274,000, leaving an area still to be sold of 877,000 acres. In Canterbury 2,250,000 acres had been sold, yielding £3,750,000, and there still remained about 6,250,000 acres to be disposed of. In Otago there had been sold 2,000,000 acres, realizing £1,700,000, leaving 11,500,000 acres to be disposed of. He did not think the honorable gentleman had given very good reasons for the adoption of the motion, but he would not say whether he himself would support it or not: he would be guided by further argument.

Mr. LUSK thought the honorable member for Tuapeka had misapprehended the arguments of the honorable member for Marsden. He did not understand the honorable member to say that the land was of no value, or that a very large proportion of it was swamp. What he understood the honorable gentleman to say was, that the land on the sea-coast, which was accessible by water, was not good land, but that the inlying land was very good, but was inaccessible for want of roads. When the honorable gentleman referred to the swamp land he distinctly stated that it might be turned to excellent account by the expenditure of a little money on drainage. He could speak with some degree of certainty as to the desirability of these works. A great many years had elapsed since the settlers in this district took up their land; they had struggled on against great difficulties, and had succeeded in holding their own, but they had not made the progress it was desirable they should make. The motion did not ask the House to do anything new. It did not ask it to do anything that it had not done, and was not actually doing now, for other parts of the colony. He understood that a very large sum of money was to be asked for in order to provide for certain provincial liabilities, and those liabilities were to a large extent intended to meet payments for works which in no sense differed from those referred to in the honorable gentleman's motion. The only difference between these works and some others that were included in the provincial liabilities was that the sums for the execution of these latter works had actually been put down in the provincial estimates, but had never been expended. He did not see that that made any great difference. The mere fact that they were put down in the Estimates, and that no steps had been taken to carry them out, did not seem to him to give any greater guarantee for the carrying out of these works than the promise that these works should be carried out as soon as the money could be got. He thought the House would admit that, in all fairness, these works should be included in the provincial liabilities of the Province of Auckland. They were works which the provincial authorities promised to carry out, and about which a great amount of correspondence took place, not only between the provincial authorities and the settlers, but between the provincial authorities and the Colonial Government when the Colonial Government was about to advance money for these works. Under these circumstances he thought they should be treated as provincial liabilities of the province. That, he understood, was the object of the motion. Did the House but know the circumstances of the district, were the members but cognizant of the efforts that had for many years been made by the settlers to improve their own position, and to develop the resources of a country which would hereafter be a source of great wealth to the colony, they would not begrudge the assistance asked for.

Mr. MANDERS thought the honorable member for Marsden had very clearly put a case which applied not only to the honorable gentleman's own district but to his (Mr. Manders's). Works of this kind should be encouraged. They were works of a class which the Provincial Council of Otago had endeavoured to encourage, and he thought it was the duty of the State to give every facility for the development of works which would aid the efforts of working-men who were endeavouring to advance the value of their property as well as the interest of the district they lived in, and, consequently, the prosperity of the colony as a whole. He cordially supported the motion.

Mr. WHITAKER said he did not intend to repeat the arguments that had been advanced in favour of the motion. He merely wished to remind the House that the North of Auckland had a strong claim in the fact that no part of the money voted for the construction of railways in various parts of the colony had been spent in the district north of Auckland, except one short line to Kaipara. That district had already been described as one of very great importance, and one which would hereafter contribute largely to the revenue of the colony. All the people resident in the North of Auckland would have to contribute their share of the interest on moneys already borrowed, and he thought they had an unanswerable claim to the expenditure asked for. He should therefore support the motion.

Mr. SHEEHAN thought it was a pity that the honorable member for Marsden should have raised a discussion on this motion, which was purely a formal step. It would have been better to have moved the motion formally, and to have taken the discussion on the subject when the motion came on for consideration in Committee. It was extremely gratifying to hear the opinions expressed by the honorable gentlemen in favour of justice being done to the North of Auckland. He (Mr. Sheehan) had to fight that battle two or three years ago; and last year, when he moved a motion expressing the same sentiment, it was opposed tooth and nail, Sir Julius Vogel stating that it was a "bogus" motion, introduced for the purpose of talking to his (Mr. Sheehan's) constituents and not to the House. Times were changing, and, he supposed, men were changing also. He was very glad that there was at last a probability that the North of Auckland would receive some assistance. The sum of £50,000 which was voted by the House for roads and works north of Auckland was only partially spent as it was intended to be spent. A large portion of it was spent for the purpose of keeping the Natives quiet, and another large portion of it was expended on works altogether outside the districts in which it should have been spent. He quite agreed with the honorable member for Marsden that the whole of the works referred to in the motion would have been carried out if the provinces had continued to exist and the promises of the General Government to assist had been fulfilled. He also agreed that these were strictly provincial liabilities, and he confessed to a want of shrewdness on the part of himself and others who were members of the Provincial Council of Auckland in 1874 and 1875 in not having piled up the provincial liabilities as they might have done. Other provinces which did so were now getting hundreds of thousands of pounds: in fact, he thought that the farther south they went the more "canny" the people became, and the better they understood the way to work the financial oracle. He would point out to the honorable member for Marsden that he should make his motion apply to the whole of the district north of Auckland, because his was not the only place in which money was required to be expended in the same way. At the same time it should be remembered that it was not advisable to authorize the expenditure of more money than the colony had or could raise. On Monday next the Colonial Treasurer would make his Financial Statement, and the House would then be able to see what amount of money was available for the purpose, and whether it was desirable that the works should be proceeded with. It was quite true that on the Supplementary Estimates a large number of extra works were asked for, and these extra works he believed were estimated to cost about £170,000. In reference to that, he might say that, if they were to carry out those supplementary works, it would be necessary to provide that that part of the colony from which he himself and the honorable member for Marsden came should receive more consideration than was proposed to be given to it, if the financial state of the colony admitted of it. In fact, he thought far more might be done for the North of Auckland than was at present contemplated. He believed that the honorable member for Waikato had managed to get a sum of £10,000 placed on the Supplementary Estimates for works north of Auckland, but in his opinion that sum was not nearly enough. It was well known that the resources of the country north of Auckland were very great. There was an immense field for settlement, and there were great riches in the shape of minerals, &c. He hoped that the district would get a fair share of the public money.

Mr. REES said the honorable gentleman who had brought forward this motion had availed himself of his (Mr. Rees's) assistance and advice before moving in the matter. He found that, though the colony would this year have to provide £661,000 on account of provincial liabilities, the Province of Auckland would only get £9,405. As the Native Minister had put it, the Provincial Council of Auckland was determined that when the province was wound up there should be found as little as possible in the shape of debt in connection with it. The consequence was that the province had no bank overdraft, and there were no contracts in existence, so that the colony had neither to pay off any overdraft nor to carry out any contracts on behalf of the province. Last year the provincial liabilities of Auckland were only £2,000, and this year the munificent sum of £9,405 7s. 10d. was set down. While Auckland was only to get that small amount, Taranaki was to receive, in round numbers, £20,683; Wellington, £194,162; Hawke's Bay, £8,333; Nelson, £66,742; Marlborough, £6,536; Canterbury, £95,473; Westland, £13,043; and Otago, £246,664. It would be seen that Otago, Canterbury, Nelson, and Wellington would get by far the greater part of the money, while the second province in the colony—a province which possessed great undeveloped resources, and which had all the natural products which tended to make a country prosperous—was to receive the munificent sum of £9,405. That province was possessed of vast wealth in the shape of gold, iron, timber, and flax: in fact, as far as its resources went, it was perhaps unequalled by any other province in the colony. As he had said, that province was to get the munificent sum of £9,405, which sum would have to be spent during the current year, and it would then be charged as a debt against the province. This was not only not just, but it was inexpedient. He found that the money was to be spent on gaols, hospitals, harbours, and other kinds of works; and therefore the honorable gentleman who asked that this motion should be carried by the House was merely asking that, to some small extent, the district which he represented might be put upon an equal footing with the rest of the colony. There had been as yet literally nothing done for the settlements in the North of Auckland. In Port Albert, for instance, there had been no money spent, and the settlers, who were industrious, hard-working, and honest men, had been compelled to expend fully as much as the value of the produce they had raised in making roads to their farms and clearing their land. As the House would see, he himself had a motion referring to the same subject on the Order Paper. He thought that the honorable member for Marsden was making a just and reasonable claim. He trusted that the Government would be induced to place on the Estimates for this purpose such a sum of money as the colony would have had to expend if the Provincial Council of Auckland had made all sorts of votes before the Abolition Act came into operation. As he had shown, the Province of Nelson was to get £66,742 this year on account of provincial liabilities, and he believed that last year the same province received between £30,000 and £40,000 for the same purpose; and, while there was so great a difference in the sums that were to be spent in the two Provinces of Auckland and Nelson, the population of the latter was only about one-fourth that of the former. If the population of Auckland had been taken into consideration the province should, in comparison with Nelson, have received about £220,000. The complaint of the honorable member for Marsden was that, though the money he asked for had been voted by the Provincial Council of Auckland, his district was to be neglected. It was to be neglected, first, because the Provincial Council of Auckland had not the money to expend; and, secondly, because the Provincial Council would not leave itself entangled in a mass of debts when it gave up the ghost. That was the only reason; and therefore there was a great amount of justice in the demand made. But the argument would be strengthened, if it required to be strengthened, by this consideration: that the people in the Districts of Rodney, Waitemata, Bay of Islands, and Marsden paid just as much in the way of Customs duties as the people in Wellington, Dunedin, or Canterbury, and yet received no share of the expenditure. They were consenting to pay taxes unparalleled in extent—a rate per head never paid before by any people; and what for? Simply for the purpose of paying interest upon a debt which had been spent elsewhere. They had no benefit from the enormous amounts of money which had been expended in Otago and Canterbury—Canterbury, which had been the Benjamin of this colonial family, which had had a large Land Fund, and had had an enormous amount of borrowed money spent in it on railways and public works.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—We do not give our land away for 5s. per acre.

Mr. REES said that did not in the least affect the question. It was an illustration of the proverb given them on Divine authority that, "To him that hath shall be given, and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." The honorable members for Waitemata, Rodney, Bay of Islands, and Marsden saw their constituents compelled to pay, year after year, a full share of the taxation, in order simply to pay the interest on the borrowed money spent in Canterbury.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—We pay every half-penny.

Mr. REES said the figures did not show it. He would put it in this way: The total amount spent in public works and immigration had been thirteen millions, and, out of that, one-third, or nearly one-half, had been spent in the Provinces of Otago and Canterbury. He felt sure he was not wrong in saying that, and he was equally sure that those provinces did not pay one-half the interest, or anything like it, and, besides that, they had a large Land Fund. While the Province of Auckland was more populous, and while from the very first it had been paying large amounts in the shape of Customs revenue to the general revenue of the colony, double the amount of borrowed money had been spent in Canterbury or in Otago that had been spent in Auckland. All that the people of Auckland were doing was to pay interest on money spent in Canterbury and Otago. The only public work in Auckland had been the Auckland and Mercer Railway. The provincial liabilities estimates for the present year showed clearly the position that Auckland was in. The estimated expenditure in Auckland this year, excepting necessary governmental expenditure, was something like £10,000, while in Canterbury it reached something like £100,000 odd. He did not complain of that, nor did he deny the right of the Provincial Council to place itself in the position in which it had placed itself; but he thought that, when the Province of Auckland showed itself to be in want of some urgently-required public work exactly analogous to those which were treated in other provinces as provincial liabilities, then it was entitled to careful consideration. The same thing was to be seen in the Supplementary Estimates for this year. The estimated expenditure in Auckland on account of immigration and public works was about £10,000 or £12,000 out of a total amount of £180,000 or £190,000. Take the two things together—that of a total amount of £180,000 or £190,000 on the Supplementary Estimates Auckland was to get £10,000 or £12,000, and that of a vote of £661,000 for provincial liabilities only £9,000 fell to Auckland. Was that fair? He submitted that it was not fair; and it was for that reason that he urged upon the honorable member to make his complaint a general one as regarded the Province of Auckland. The remedy for this was what he had pointed out. The Province of Auckland would have been able to do these works if it had been treated properly. It voted the money, and would have executed the works if the ordinary proportion of the Customs revenue had been given to it: if the agreement in that respect made in 1870 had been carried out, every one of these works would have been done, roads would have been constructed, the jetty at Whangarei would have been built, the tramway would have been purchased—all these useful and reproductive works would have been attended to if the Customs revenue had not been taken away, and if there had not been a reversal of the promises made in 1870. He did not care so much about the particular items, but he trusted the principle would be adopted that there must be something in the way of reparation to these districts, seeing that the province had never been in a position to spend money; because, although the people had paid enormous sums into the revenue, they had had to shave everything very closely in order to be able to defray the ordinary expenses of government. He did not care so much about the items as about the principle. Auckland had had scant justice or no justice at all, and he trusted the principle would be indorsed and the Ministry invited to make some reasonable reparation, so as to place Auckland in a fair and equal position as compared with other provinces, and so as to remove from the minds of the settlers the impression that they were paying taxes in order to pay the interest upon borrowed money spent in other places. If the money had been expended fairly there could be no doubt that all these works in Auckland would have been done long before this. The people of Auckland had felt keenly for some time; and the same inequality which had marked the past was to be seen this year, when, out of an expenditure of £661,000 to meet provincial liabilities, Auckland was only to have some £9,000. It could hardly be said that that was treating that populous and wealthy part of the country in a proper manner. The people of that province should be induced to think that their interests received the same consideration at the hands of the House as those of any other part of the colony.

Mr. GISBORNE said that, if any argument were required to show that the proposed appropriations for public works in different parts of the colony required careful consideration, it would be found in the estimate of the sum that would be required in the year ending the 30th June, 1878, to defray the salaries, expenses, and services chargeable as provincial liabilities. The honorable member for Auckland City East and the honorable member for Rodney seemed to think that Auckland was placed in a worse position merely because its Provincial Council did not vote as large a sum for public works in excess of their appropriations as other provinces; but there was a much lower depth of, he would not say iniquity, but of unequality, in these transactions than was furnished by the appropriations of the Provincial Councils. If honorable gentlemen would look at this estimate they would find the large appropriations which were made under the Provincial Appropriations Extension Acts. How were those sums appropriated? They had been made by the Superintendents in conjunction with the Colonial Treasurer or some one representing the Government. He was afraid the late Superintendent of Auckland was not as wise in his generation as "the children of light" who were Superintendents of other provinces. The provincial appropriations were concocted by the Superintendents in conjunction with the Colonial Treasurer, either by telegraph or by correspondence, without any one else knowing anything about the matter. In Auckland those appropriations only amounted to £2,034 4s. 1d.; in Taranaki they amounted to £6,417 17s. 4d.—three times as large as for the Province of Auckland. In Wellington, the seat of Government, the provincial appropriations amounted to £63,733 17s. 6d. In Hawke's Bay they had been pretty moderate: they only amounted to £1,706 11s. 5d. The Superintendent of Nelson, in his dying moments, seemed to have been rather prodigal of the public money, as there the provincial appropriations amounted to £21,038 6s. 2d. In Marlborough they amounted to £2,386 1s. 9d., or over £300 more than in Auckland. He would not say anything about Canterbury, as it had money at its credit. Its appropriations amounted to £55,808 14s. In Westland they amounted to £10,723 4s.; and in Otago they amounted to £57,997 2s. 8d. It would be plainly seen that those were very unequal appropriations for public works in the different provinces, and which, in the case of those provinces which had not the money, would have to be paid now out of the colonial funds. He would say that such a state of affairs furnished a very strong argument that the Government should, in placing items for public works on the Supplementary Estimates, really try to adjust the inequality in some way or another, because, after all, those large liabilities had been imposed on the colony by concert between Superintendents and the Ministers of the day, without any appropriation by the provincial representatives or by the representatives of the colony. Those provinces should not get the benefit of the advantage taken, he believed, in excess of the law, and of which advantage the Superintendents of other provinces did not choose to avail themselves. The Government should consider the whole system of providing money for those large public works which had no Provincial Councils now to look after them, which were not looked after by the County Councils, and which the Road Boards could not now look after. The Government should take the question of making provision for those public works into their serious consideration, and try and distribute that provision equitably and fairly over the whole colony. He quite recognized the claim included in the motion of the honorable and gallant baronet. Provision should be made for roads and works of the character named; but he hoped that the Government, in considering the question, would not confine themselves to Whangarei or the North of Auckland, but would extend their view over the whole colony. Until such time as a system was provided by which works could be executed by the local authorities, this House, in distributing the funds, should do so as fairly and as equitably as possible.

Mr. REYNOLDS could not exactly agree with the last speaker, or with the honorable member for Auckland City East. There was no doubt that in the Provinces of Canterbury and Otago there was a large amount of provincial liabilities, but in both those cases the land revenue would meet those liabilities; whereas, in the other provinces, he did not think the land revenue would be so readily available to meet the liabilities which might be incurred. The honorable member for Auckland City East had evidently not seen the return which had been laid on the table lately, otherwise he would not have made the statements he had made. The honorable member stated that Auckland had been very badly used for years past. He (Mr. Reynolds) was prepared to prove that there had been a larger expenditure in Auckland than there had been either in Otago or Canterbury. He was prepared to prove that from this return. The following were the amounts expended for ordinary purposes, exclusive of Native and Defence, out of the Consolidated Fund and out of loan in the Province of Auckland from 1856-57 to 1873-74:—Out of revenue, 42 per cent. on the whole of the contributions during those years to the Consolidated Fund, and 31 per cent. out of loan. In Canterbury, the figures were respectively 46 per cent. and 26½ per cent., and in Otago 42 and 16½ per cent. In addition to this return, there had been a return laid on the table for the last three years; and what did they find? They found that in 1874-75 there had been expended in Auckland—out of revenue 52 per cent., out of loan 146 per cent.; for 1875-76, 53½ and 108½; for 1876-77, 50½ and 63½; while in Canterbury the figures stood, for 1874-75, 41½ and 135½; 1875-76, 46 and 115; 1876-77, 51½ and 24½; and in Otago, for 1874-75, 33½ and 146; 1875-76, 35½ and 109½; 1876-77, 40 and 85½. Those who would take the trouble to study these two returns would be able to judge for themselves whether Auckland had not received a much larger expenditure in proportion to her contributions to the revenue since the introduction of the Constitution Act than either Canterbury or Otago. The honorable member had made a great mistake in saying that a larger expenditure out of revenue and out of loans had been incurred in Otago and Canterbury. He was astonished to see that there were many honorable members who had taken the same view, notwithstanding that the statement had been contradicted times without number. Even the honorable member for Egmont had stated that this return was of no use. Well, it was a return from the Treasury.

Major ATKINSON.—Not approved of by it.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—It was a return from the Treasury of the revenue and expenditure in each provincial district, and he could not understand how it could be called fallacious. He would quote some figures to show how it might be considered fallacious and not approved of by the honorable member for Egmont. He found that Taranaki had received 82 per cent. out of revenue and 79½ per cent. out of loan up to the year 1874. What did they find for the last three years? In 1874-75 Taranaki had received out of revenue 113½ per cent. and 420½ per cent. out of loan; in 1875-76, 112 per cent. out of revenue and 267 per cent. out of loan; in 1876-77, 114 per cent. out of revenue and 394 per cent. out of loan. This expenditure was altogether irrespective of that incurred for Native and Defence purposes. If the honorable member considered the return unreliable, let him contradict the accuracy of those figures by proving them wrong. If the honorable member could contradict those figures, then he would admit that he was right in his opinion.

Mr. KELLY said the honorable member for Port Chalmers had made a great mistake in including the war expenditure which had taken place in Taranaki as local expenditure. He had also omitted to give credit for Customs revenue paid in other ports. The return was therefore utterly fallacious as regarded Taranaki.

Mr. MACANDREW thought it only right to state that, in the case of Otago, to which allusion had been made, the liabilities had been legally incurred for contracts entered into by the Provincial Government prior to the date of abolition, some of which extended over several years, and that not one of them had been incurred by virtue of any arrangement between the Colonial Executive and the Superintendent of the province. The same could not be said in the case of Nelson, where he found a liability of £30,000 had been incurred within a few days of the end of 1876, nearly three months after the provinces had been abolished. He had no doubt there was concert between some individual and the General Government in that case; but there was nothing of the kind in the case of Otago.

Mr. HUNTER, speaking for Wellington, might repeat what had been said by the last speaker in regard to Otago. As far as he was aware, nothing of the kind alluded to had happened in regard to Wellington. The £194,000 charged against that province was, to the extent of £100,000, to repay a loan, and was secured by mortgage on the land reclaimed from the harbour. Those who had had anything to do with the administration of affairs in this province had always looked upon that as an asset very much larger than the amount secured on it, and that it would recoup all the liabilities of the province. He believed that the greater part of the liabilities, except the £100,000, set down against Wellington were for appropriations by the late Provincial Council. The amount for the reclamation, £28,000, might have been under Act of the General Assembly, but the rest was voted by the Provincial Council under the advice of the Superintendent and his Executive Council. As a contrast had been made between different provinces, it was only fair to say that at the time the administration of the affairs of the provinces fell into the hands of the General Government arrangements could have been made to pay off all the provincial liabilities to the General Government, including £275,000 raised under the Wellington Debts Act, a considerable portion of which had since been paid off by the debentures received from the Manchester Association. Those who had had anything to do with the administration of the affairs of the province knew that it was handed over to the General Government solvent, and he was sure, if the asset to which he had referred was administered by the General Government as it would have been by the late Provincial Government, it would ultimately discharge the whole of the liabilities.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE LANDS BILL.

Mr. REES moved, That this Bill be committed on Thursday, the 15th instant; and said that when he obtained leave to introduce it about two months ago it was fairly discussed and favourably considered. It simply had for its object to enable Natives to recover rent from Europeans, and to enable the Europeans to pay their rent to the Natives in specified sums, so that they might not have to pay it over again. He had taken occasion to state to the House the position of Native titles under "The Native Lands Act, 1867," and "The Native Lands Act, 1873," which seemed to his mind to render it necessary that some such Bill as this should be introduced. The Bill was read a second time after discussion, and was then referred to the Native Affairs Committee. He attended the meetings of that Committee by invitation, and, as far as he could judge, the measure met with the favourable opinion of the Committee. Afterwards, however, a report was brought up by the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Bryce), in which the Committee came to a decision that, as the matter was one which ought to form part of a general measure dealing with the important subject of Native lands, and as that subject should be considered as a whole, and some fresh law passed incorporating only so much of the old law as would make the new workable, it would not be well to deal piecemeal with the subject, and therefore it might be better not to go on with this measure. The only objection, as far as he knew, that had been raised to the Bill by any persons interested in the matter, whether by European or Native, was raised by the chief Renata. Renata was a well-known chief residing in Hawke's Bay, a man who, personally and by his connection with various other hapus, was part owner or whole owner of large blocks of land in that province. He represented that if this Bill were passed it would take away from the large owners of different blocks their power to recover the right portion of the rent which was due to them, because it enabled the Native grantees to demand, and the European to pay to each of such grantees, an equal portion of the rent until the relative portions of each were defined by the Native Land Courts. The Bill did not open up that question at all. It left untouched the consideration of all questions in which, by agreement amongst themselves, the Natives had decided on a definite portion of the land as belonging to each of them, and also where agreements had been made by Europeans that they should pay to one or more of the Native grantees on the part of the whole. Therefore, when any agreement had been entered into between the Natives themselves or between Europeans and Natives, that agreement would be left untouched. If the Bill were committed as he proposed, these objections might be heard; but if, on the other hand, the feeling of the House was that the Bill, being a part of another and larger measure which would have to be introduced next session to deal with Native lands—a subject which required much studious care—should be postponed until next session, he would not press his motion, especially when he considered that the session was so very late that it was inadvisable now to add any Orders to the Order Paper except such as were absolutely necessary. He moved this motion not so much for the purpose of pressing the Bill on as to explain the reason why the Native Affairs Committee recommended that it should not be pressed. As he had introduced the Bill, he did not like to let it drop without giving the reasons why he did not press it upon the House.

Captain RUSSELL was present during the sittings of the Native Affairs Committee when the Bill was considered, and might say that the way in which the honorable gentleman who had introduced it argued the question before the Committee showed that he was only desirous to do what was beneficial to both races. Unfortunately he (Captain Russell) was not present when the report was drawn up; but he thoroughly concurred in that report. He had armed himself with certain reasons why the Bill should be postponed, but, as he understood that it was not the wish of the honorable member for Auckland City East to press it, he would not go into those reasons. He would merely say that he had received several telegrams from Natives on the subject—one from Renata, who had got it into his head, whether rightly or wrongly, that the Bill if passed would injure him. The next telegram he received was from Renata and Tareha; and he had since heard that a petition was being got up by thirteen of the leading chiefs in Hawke's Bay, praying that the Bill should not be passed. He thought himself that the arguments which were urged by the honorable member on the second reading of the Bill had a great deal of force in them. It was necessary that something should be done to enable the Natives to take proceedings when the rent was not paid or was paid wrongly. As, however, it would be well to consider the whole of the subject next session, he would move, That the Bill be committed that day three months, unless the honorable gentleman should prefer to withdraw it.

Mr. REES would prefer that the matter should be decided on the voices. He did not wish to push the Bill, but would sooner the House took the responsibility of postponing it than that he who had introduced it should afterwards allow it to drop.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be committed that day three months.

COUNTY AND MUNICIPAL ENDOWMENTS.

Mr. MURRAY, in moving the motion standing in his name, said it was probably rather late in the session to introduce a question of such importance, but it would serve to ventilate the subject, and would probably induce the Government during the recess to devise a general system of policy to provide endowments from the public estate for the benefit of the counties and the municipalities throughout the colony. They were promised, as one of the results of Abolition, that the counties would receive substantial endowments; but that promise had not yet been carried out. The substantial endowments were taken from the taxation of the people, taxation which was raised from the great bulk of the population to be given to the owners of property; and, generally speaking, money raised in such a way was not very wisely expended. It was part of the policy introduced by Sir Julius Vogel to allow the House to get the control of the largest possible amount of money, and then to dole it out to the constituencies. Thus, instead of giving the people a real system of local government, they were made pensioners of the central authority. That was the system he wished to see avoided. He wished to see a system adopted which would provide a means by which the local bodies would be subsidized with permanently substantial endowments, leaving them to secure their own progress by the economic management of those endowments. Some time ago a motion was placed on the Paper by the honorable member for Waikato, who asked what provision had been made for the maintenance of the main roads in the various counties. They had since had very important evidence of the necessity of some such provision being made. The motion of the honorable member for Marsden, which was agreed to that afternoon, also pointed to the necessity for the adoption of some systematic and comprehensive plan by which these local bodies might be placed in funds to meet their own local requirements. The Parliament had now the control of a very large and valuable public estate, and it would act wisely in setting apart some substantial endowments, out of which those who came after them would be able to provide the means for the maintenance of hospitals and other charitable institutions. By doing so they would erect a lasting monument which would reflect creditably upon themselves. If they sacrificed the public estate future generations would curse the prodigal father who squandered their patrimony. It might be said that in making these endowments they would be locking up a large area of land which might be sold, and the proceeds used for various public purposes; but he maintained that the public estate could not be more beneficially utilized than by setting apart a reasonable proportion of it as endowments for local bodies. It might be said, also, that by so disposing of the public estate the public creditor would be deprived of his security; but it should be borne in mind that the proceeds derivable from the whole of the public lands of Great Britain only amounted to £350,000 a year, and it was not the security of that paltry property that enabled Great Britain to borrow £800,000,000 of money. Handing over the land as endowments for public bodies was not carting it into the sea. The land still remained as security to the public creditor; but the sooner it passed into the hands of public bodies the sooner it would pass into profitable occupation. As long as the lands remained in the possession of the State they would be a source of trouble in that House, and the Government would be induced to deal with them in a way which was not consistent with Parliamentary independence. This proposal would get rid of the claims which were continually forced upon the Legislature by the local bodies. By giving them really substantial endowments, the local bodies would not require to come up for their annual dole to enable them to provide for their local works, and the prophecy of the late Colonial Treasurer would be realized—the formation of roads, bridges, and other provincial works would never be heard of in that House, “except by way of congratulation.” If the motion were carried to its legitimate issue the local bodies would be in a position to construct their own works; but if, on the other hand, they were improvident, as they made their beds so they would have to lie on them. If they were left to control their own private affairs, he was satisfied that the money would be much more wisely spent than it would be by the General Legislature. Under clause 350 and the following clauses of the Municipal Corporations Act of last year, it was competent to grant endowments to the extent of 2,000 acres to local bodies; but no allowance was made for difference in population. The second part of the motion provided that the endowments for municipalities should be made in proportion to population. By that means the larger municipalities, which had greater claims upon the colonial funds, would get larger endowments, and the smaller towns, which were at present precluded from receiving any endowment, would get some advantage as its share of the public estate. This proposal would not initiate any new system. A similar system was already in operation in Victoria, and in the United States. Amongst the returns furnished by the chief officers of departments of the Government services in America he found a statement made by the Commissioner-General of the Land Office to the effect that most of the towns at present being laid out contained on the average 16,000 to 23,000 acres. The lands outside the town not being required for building purposes, or for township lands, were set aside as endowments specially for the benefit of the towns. Although there was no general system in Victoria, a considerable extent of land had been set apart as endowments for municipalities. Ballarat had a very large endowment, which was productive of very great advantage to the people of that city. The amount of land set apart in the United States as endowments for towns was 5,221,000 acres. Relatively the positions of America and New Zealand were analogous, for, although the population of America was much greater than that of New Zealand, its extent of public lands was also greater, so that the population in proportion to the amount of public lands was about the same in both cases. Therefore they would act wisely in following the example of the United States. It would be foolish, with the public estate they had at their disposal, not to make provision for those who were to come after them. When they considered the enormous claims that were made on the municipalities for the means to carry out sanitary works, water supply, drainage schemes, and other measures to provide for the general health of the people, it would be admitted that the burdens upon them were greater than they could possibly bear. The honorable member for Port Chalmers would bear him out when he said that, although the City of Dunedin was largely endowed, its burdens were very heavy, and would become much more heavy as the population became more dense. He regretted that he had not had time to get up the subject, so as to do that justice to it which its importance demanded, but his time had been so fully occupied in attendance on Committees that he had not been able to give to it the full consideration it deserved. However, the motion would call attention to it, and, although the result could not take any tangible form this session, he hoped the Government would, during the recess, take the matter into consideration with the view to bringing down a Bill next session by which the system of reserves might be dealt with in some comprehensive way. It was most disheartening to witness the constant scrambling in that House for endowments for harbours, atheneums, commonages, and every other description of public institution that could possibly be imagined. It was necessary that they should all be placed on the same footing. As the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe) said, they should all start fair. There were districts which, by their unfortunate disadvantages, had not a large extent of Crown lands at their disposal. They were poor, and their poverty impelled them to make claims upon the House; but their demands were not always corresponding to their necessities, and it was not those who clamoured the loudest who should receive the largest share of consideration. They should all be put in the same position. He would reserve any further remarks he had to make until he made his reply upon the discussion. He trusted that, without any unnecessary delay, honorable members would agree to the resolutions of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and question proposed, "(1.) That each county in New Zealand should have a permanent inalienable endowment of Crown lands, in proportion to the area of such county, and the endowment, where possible, to be within the county. (2.) That each municipality in New Zealand should have a permanent inalienable endowment of public lands, in proportion to population, and the endowment, where available, to be within the municipality."—(Mr. Murray.)

Mr. O'RORKE thought it right to draw attention to a branch of the subject which was worthy the consideration of the House. It was in the knowledge of honorable members that in passing the Municipal Corporations Act last session provision was made by which municipalities might acquire endowments outside their boundaries. He did not intend to go into the whole question now; but he thought that as a rule the endowments should be as nearly as possible within the specific boundaries of the municipalities. What he wished to draw attention to was the manner in which that clause of the Bill had been acted upon. He had heard a great deal in the House of having one united colony, but he believed that underneath that cry there was a desire, on the part of some who clamoured loudly for unity, to absorb as much of the public estate as possible for local purposes. It did not appear to his mind to be fair that the members for the City of Christchurch, Messrs. Richardson, Sterens, and Moorhouse, could obtain for their borough 2,000 acres of land, not within the town boundaries, but amongst the fat lands of Timaru. The honorable member for Lyttelton also had no difficulty in acquiring for his borough 2,000 acres of fine land in the Ashburton District; the honorable member for Kaiapoi also could get 2,000 acres of land for his borough; and his honorable friend the member for Akaroa could do the same. It struck him as being remarkably unfair that all this could take place without the knowledge of the House, and that, too, after the House had prorogued last session; and yet, when he asked the House during the session for a small endowment within the municipality which he represented, he was debarred, by a practice which had grown up in the House, from bringing the matter under discussion. Unless he could obtain the consent of the Ministry to bring it under discussion the House could not deal with it, and yet, when the session was over, favoured members could get any land they wanted for their constituencies. He held that some members should not obtain favours of this sort while others were excluded. It was with the view of having the matter fully considered by the House at some future period that he would propose the following addition to the motion—namely, "and that no grants under 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1876,' of land outside municipal boundaries be made before the close of next session, in order that a further opportunity may be afforded for considering the endowment of municipalities on some uniform system." He believed that some of the Corporations in Canterbury which had obtained grants of land were among the richest in the country, while poorer municipalities could not obtain anything at all. He was in favour of giving endowments for the construction of waterworks and public undertakings of that sort, but he did not think it was desirable that municipalities should have princely estates a hundred miles off. He did not move the amendment with a desire to interfere with the proposal of his honorable friend the member for Bruce: in fact, it was quite a distinct proposal, on which the sense of the House could be taken apart from the decision on the main question.

Mr. BURNS did not object to the resolutions of the honorable member for Bruce, because the House would have another opportunity of discussing the matter; but he did object to the addition proposed by the honorable member for Onehunga. The House last year passed the Municipal Corporations Act, under which numbers of municipalities had already been formed, and they had been looking forward to getting their endowments under that Act. He did not think it would be fair that the power of granting those endowments should be taken away. This was no new thing. There was scarcely a city within the colony which had not got endowments already, and any city that came under the existing Act would get the endowments they were entitled to. It would be wise, he thought, on the part of the House to reject the proposition of the honorable member for Onehunga. It would be better for the House at once to say that it would hang up the whole Act for a year, because then the public would know what they were about. He thought it would be most unfair, after having passed the Act and allowed many municipalities to come under its provisions, to deprive these municipalities of the right of obtaining the grants of land that they were fully entitled to under the present law. It was natural that the honorable member for Onehunga should feel aggrieved if the municipalities in his district could not obtain the grants of land to which they were justly entitled, but there could be no doubt that any city or municipality which had come under the operation of the Act was entitled to claim such grants. He hoped the House would pause and consider before it agreed to the motion.

Mr. MONTGOMERY wished to make an alteration in the original motion. He desired to excise the words "in proportion to the area of such county" from the first part of the motion. In the Provincial District of Canterbury, from which he came, there were several counties of very large area, and some of the land within them was so inferior in quality that it was of very little value. Therefore it would not be fair to give the counties endowments in proportion to the area within their own boundaries. It was not fair to make endowments irrespective of the requirements of a district. He would move, That the words "in proportion to the area of such county" be struck out; and he would have a few words to say thereafter respecting the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Onehunga. He might say at present that he sympathized with those municipalities which had got their endowments under the Act, and he did not believe that the House would consent so to deprive them. He thought, however, that the whole question of endowments, and also of subsidies paid from the consolidated revenue, should be considered next session. At the present time the City of Christchurch was absolutely without endowments of any sort except the 2,000 acres of land lately reserved, while Auckland, Wellington, and Dunedin were largely endowed. When they began to consider the question of endowments they would have to take into consideration the endowments which were already held by some municipalities. It might be considered unfair that a municipality which was already largely endowed by reserves of land should have the same amount of subsidy annually from the consolidated revenue as a town of the same size which had no landed endowment. He was of opinion that it would be found that the Corporations in the Provincial District of Canterbury were very lightly endowed. A very large question had been opened up by this motion, and it would have to be considered at some future time; but it would certainly be unjust to prevent the provisions of the law from being carried out in those cases where municipalities had been formed under the Municipal Corporations Act. Christchurch had an endowment of 2,000 acres of land, which, at the outside, would bring in about £400 a year. He did not think that that was a proper endowment for a city of that size. He would vote against the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga.

Mr. STEVENS intended to support the proposal of the honorable member for Bruce, and he did so because he felt convinced that, although no practical action might come of it immediately, yet it pointed in the direction he desired to go. He agreed very much with what the honorable member for Akaroa had said, that there were cities and boroughs which were absolutely without any endowment except the 2,000 acres given to each municipality by the Act of last year; but the principle adopted last year seemed faulty, inasmuch as every borough, without reference to its size, got the same quantity of land. That he considered to be very rough justice, if justice at all. Still, so far as reversing the action of last year seemed to be proposed, he could not consent to that. The question opened up by the honorable member for Bruce was of so large and important a character that he had been rather surprised to hear no indication given by the Government of the view they took of the matter. The honorable gentleman in charge of the finances of the colony must be aware of the enormous drain upon the land revenue for these annual aids to revenue in order to secure some approximation to making revenue meet expenditure; therefore he submitted that the Government should, before the discussion closed, give the House some indication of what were their feelings upon the subject. It was far too large a question to be treated as an ordinary private member's motion, and perhaps his hint would not be allowed to pass unnoticed. He should like to take this opportunity of going much further than the honorable member for Akaroa. He would say point-blank that in his opinion the time was rapidly approaching, if it had not already arrived, when the subsidies from the Consolidated Fund to these local bodies, whether to the municipalities or to counties, must be resumed by the colony, and when fixed endowments must be given from the landed estate as part of that general scheme of consolidating the resources of the colony which could not be much longer escaped. He might add that he thought that, as this question entered so largely into and so immediately affected the financial position of the colony generally, it would have been much better taken in a Budget discussion. The honorable member for Bruce had brought forward a question the last of which would not be heard that day, and he (Mr. Stevens) should support him in the position he took up.

Mr. MACANDREW assured the honorable gentleman that the Government thanked him for the hint; but it was not necessary, for it had been arranged that the Premier should express the opinion of the Government on the question, which no doubt he would do before the debate ended. He might add that he hoped the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga would not be pressed, because it would interfere with certain applications which had been granted, and in respect of which the lands were in course of being handed over. He thought it would be wrong to interfere with these.

Mr. W. WOOD said he had no doubt that the Government had given the matter serious consideration, and he quite agreed that the effect of the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Onehunga would be a great injustice, if passed. But he was not sure that it would have any effect. If agreed to, it would become part of the resolution, and, as was well known, a resolution could not override the law. And, if any grants had been given as the honorable gentleman stated, it was the duty of the House to look closely into the matter, for neither the late nor the present Government had done its duty. The law required that the proposed grant should be laid upon the table of the House, and, if both Houses did not pass a resolution forbidding the transaction, then the municipality would obtain the grant. If one House only passed a resolution, it would have no effect. If, therefore, these grants, or proposed grants, had not been placed upon the table of the House, the law had not been conformed with. One reason why he hoped the amendment would not be agreed to was this: He himself had an application to make. He was not yet in a position to send it in, but would be in a few days. With regard to the proposal of the honorable member for Akaroa to omit some few words, he thought it advisable that those words should not be omitted. The honorable gentleman stated, and it was well known, that there was in some counties a large quantity of almost worthless land, and therefore it might happen that the endowment might be of an inferior character. It mattered not what was the quality of the land, so long as it was fairly taken—the principle would be the same.

Mr. RICHARDSON felt bound to oppose the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga, and expressed sorrow that that honorable member had introduced the question of grants in the terms in which he had, having said, amongst other things, that it was only a favoured few who had been able to secure this endowment. The fact was, the law as passed last session was open to all, and the Christchurch Borough Council, immediately on the passing of the Act, had sent in an application, and the land was granted. He believed that municipality was one of the poorest in the whole country so far as endowments were concerned. Except this 2,000 acres, which it had obtained owing to the legislation of last session, it had nothing. He must support the resolution, but must vote against any suspension of the Act of last year.

Mr. WHITAKER considered the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga one which should be adopted. As for the claims of the municipalities which had sent in applications, he would call the attention of the House to the particular terms of "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1876." Clause 350, which gave the supposed right to obtain these reserves, provided,—

"It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council, upon the request of the Council of any borough, from time to time to reserve any of the waste lands of the Crown within the provincial district in which the borough is, for the purpose of granting the same to the Corporation of the borough; but the total quantity of land so granted shall not exceed one hundred acres of land within the borough, and two thousand acres of land in any other part of such district."

By that the lands were merely set apart; but what followed? The next clause provided that a description of the land was to be placed before Parliament. The clause said,—

"A description of all lands so reserved shall be laid before Parliament during its next session thereafter; and, unless both Houses of Parliament by resolution express their disapproval thereof, the Governor may, after the conclusion of such session, grant such land or so much thereof as he thinks fit to the Corporation of the borough in trust, either for the use and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the borough, or as sites for public buildings or other special uses, or as an endowment in aid of the borough funds. But if any such resolution is passed by both Houses the said land shall cease to be so reserved."

It would be observed that the Governor was not bound to make the reserve: he was only to do it if he thought fit; so that he (Mr. Whitaker) could not see that at present any of these Corporations had any established claim whatever to the land they had applied for. Special power was given to the House to express its opinion on the matter of the reservations, and he thought the House should now avail itself of its right, and express the opinion that the whole matter should be left over till next session, to be dealt with then. That decision would not affect the cases the Hon. the Minister for Lands had spoken of, because if the reserves were made at once they could not be ratified until next session. As to the manner of granting these reserves, there did not appear to him to be any particular rule by which land should be granted. It must be conceded that the system would work very unequally. The Port of Lyttelton was not one-tenth the size of Christchurch, yet it got 1,500 acres; Christchurch got 2,000; Kaiapoi, not a very large place, got its 2,000; and Akaroa, another place in the same category, though no doubt the honorable member for Akaroa would tell them it was a very important place, got its 2,000 acres. Then Oamaru was very modest: it only got 228 acres and 2 roods. If the House once consented to give to the present applicants 2,000 acres of land each, how could they refuse to give the same quantity of land to five hundred boroughs—if there should be so many—throughout New Zealand? It was not merely a question of granting the acres of land mentioned in the return, but it was a question of endowing the many Corporations that would from time to time spring up throughout the country. He did not wonder at the honorable member for Onehunga bringing the matter forward, because it so happened that the Borough of Onehunga had no endowment of any kind whatever. The honorable member brought in a Bill for granting an endowment of a certain piece of land, situated near Onehunga, which had been purchased by the Government for a particular purpose, and not now required, but which had not been paid for—but the Bill was not passed. In the Province of Auckland there were not many Corporations, but in the Province of Otago there were a large number—some thirty or forty. Were they going to give to each of those Corporations 2,000 acres of land as an endowment? If so, he did not see how they could resist applications for similar endowments to other Corporations elsewhere. If this thing was going to be done, let all the Corporations start fair and be dealt with alike. He warned the House that there was very great difficulty about the matter, and he thought it should be fairly and fully considered before any of those endowments were granted. He thought the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga was perfectly fair, as it would allow the matter to stand over until next session. No injustice could possibly be done to those who had already made applications for endowments in stating that their applications are to stand over as they are subject to the revision of this House. They would be subject afterwards also to the option of the Governor whether the endowments should be granted or not. All that they now should do was to express the opinion that the matter should stand over until the next session of the Assembly. The motion of the honorable member for Bruce involved a most important consideration. It involved the dealing with a very large quantity of land, and if they had not a certain principle to go upon in granting that land to those different Corporations the result would be that they would find themselves in very considerable difficulty. Nothing would be lost by allowing the matter to stand over, and no injustice could possibly be done, because they could not demand the land as a matter of right. It was left to the option of the House to express an opinion, and to the option of the Governor to give the land afterwards. They said to the Governor, "Do not grant this land until the next session of the Assembly, when the whole matter shall be fairly considered." The House might either come to the conclusion that it was desirable to grant none of these endowments, or, if they agreed that they should be granted, the grants should be made without any favour to one body or another. No doubt it was very desirable that the House should come to some definite conclusion with regard to the question of endowments to municipalities. The matter was connected with the question of subsidies—whether they should continue the subsidies and endowments, whether they should give both or either. That was a matter of consideration for the House, and he thought it should not commit itself hurriedly to a decision without giving the subject further consideration. If that course were not taken, and if those endowments were made, the House would be absolutely committing itself to a course of conduct which he was satisfied would probably be found to be most inconvenient. If the original resolution were adopted, he hoped the amendment of the honorable member for Onehunga would be attached to it, in order that the matter might stand over for consideration next session.

Mr. O'RORKE might state that he did not even get the two roods for Onehunga. The only concession he got was that there might be a road made through the allotment.

Sir G. GREY wished to thank the honorable member for Bruce for having brought this subject forward. He thought the examples given them by other countries in the direction of making endowments of this kind justified the Government in saying that they would bestow the most careful consideration on the subject during the recess; and that they would endeavour to devise a measure by which effect might be given to some part of the recommendations which the honorable member for Bruce had brought forward. The Government would avail themselves of any information on the subject which the honorable member would place at their disposal, and would do their utmost to introduce a measure which he thought might be of a very beneficial character indeed. What the Government felt on the subject generally was, that they should endeavour to make the institutions now in existence as far as possible successful, and enable them to work well for the happiness and welfare of the community. He thought the plan proposed was one admirable means by which they might endeavour to bring that about. He could promise that the Government would do their utmost to introduce a measure next session bearing upon this subject, and, to such extent as could be done, give effect to the recommendations embodied in the resolution.

Mr. MOORHOUSE thought that an injustice might be done to certain portions of the colony by the adoption of a cast-iron rule. If the resolution of the honorable member for Bruce were carried it would work extremely unevenly, and in some cases unjustly. The borough which he (Mr. Moorhouse) represented had sustained a great injustice at the hands of the Provincial Council of Canterbury a very great many years ago. The early settlers of Canterbury had invested their money in the purchase of town land upon a distinct understanding, upon an agreement as solemn as could be expressed. When the City of Christchurch was first laid out, the inducement held out to the early settlers to buy sections of land was that the town should have for its endowment a grant of land more than equal the size of the city itself. That was the inducement held out by the Canterbury Association, which was supreme in those days. The land that was to be granted as an endowment was at present nearly equal in value to the original township. Mr. FitzGerald, his predecessor in the office of Superintendent, in order to relieve the Canterbury Association of the fulfilment of the promise made, propounded a scheme for selling this town land, and so relieving the settlers generally of the debt. He (Mr. Moorhouse) always entertained the idea that, from whatever point they viewed that proposal, it was extremely imprudent. Proposals were made twenty years ago, in order to balance the accounts, to make endowments of country land equivalent in value to those that were taken from the city. The city had only a very minor voice in the Provincial Council, and the representatives of the outlying districts disregarded any representations made to them, and consequently an injustice was done. The obvious reason for granting the original endowment was this: that the City of Christchurch was situated in a very flat country indeed, and at a very slight elevation above the sea. It was exceedingly difficult to drain, and at the time referred to there was no water supply, except at very enormous expense, for flushing any drains constructed for the health of the city; and, in the minds of the original founders of the settlement, it was considered that an exceptional endowment should be made in order to relieve the citizens, in their early struggles, of the enormous and extraordinary expense of organizing a town in such a place. That was evidently the object in the minds of those who founded the settlement. Appeal after appeal had been made to the Provincial Legislature for compensation for the wrong that had been inflicted upon the city. He now appealed to the House for redress in this matter. There was already a reserve in aid of the revenues of the City of Christchurch to the extent of 2,000 acres; but that was a ridiculous compensation for the extent of the loss which the people of Christchurch had sustained, and for the sacrifice which they made of their estate in the interest of the colony. It was well known by those who were acquainted with that portion of the colony that any proposal to take a drain through Christchurch would involve an expense greater than would be incurred for the same purpose in any other town in New Zealand. The amount of debt which had been thrown upon the city, and the responsibility which had been contracted by the ratepayers consequent upon necessary disbursements, had no parallel in the Colony of New Zealand. He thought, therefore, that the proposal of his honorable friend the member for Onehunga was eminently unjust as regarded Christchurch, however fully that honorable gentleman's argument might be supported by the general condition of the colony. Having made reference specially to Christchurch, he contended that it would be eminently unjust to deprive the city of the possession of a paltry endowment which it had received under the law, in common with other Corporations, to compensate it for the spoliation which had been committed twenty years ago. Whatever action the House might take, he hoped it would not deprive Christchurch of the paltry assistance that would be afforded to it by this endowment, which, as he understood, although set aside, was not Crown-granted. If that endowment had been given to the city which was originally intended, it would have been worth a thousand times as much as any endowment that had been given to almost any other city in the colony. There was now no land in the shape of an endowment in the City of Christchurch, because, by the action of the House a few days previously, the Corporation had been deprived of the use, for any material or mercantile purposes, of all the unsold lands in the city. If the Corporation had been left alone, they would have had sufficient good taste and providence to have left these things unencumbered by anything which would interfere with the health of the people of Christchurch; but the House in its wisdom had thought it right to take into its own hands the profitable use of the land, and deprive the Corporation of it. There were now no reserves in the city for the use of its inhabitants. Every reserve had gone from them for the use and in the interest of the colony. If the House believed the representations he had made of the case of Christchurch, it should be exceedingly ashamed of raising its hand to deprive the city of the very slight endowment it believed it now enjoyed under the law. The Crown grant for the 2,000 acres which had been set aside ought to issue, and until that measure of justice was conceded he would never cease to demand it. There was no parallel in the colony of endowments made by its founders so ample as those for Christchurch, and if the trust had only been carried out the income from those endowments would have been employed in relieving the necessarily heavy burdens upon the inhabitants of the town, and the pressure consequent upon the topographical condition of the city and its neighbourhood. He trusted the House would hesitate before it affirmed a resolution which would have the effect of denying to his constituents what they were eminently entitled to.

Mr. BOWEN said that the course taken by the honorable member for Onehunga appeared to him to be a very unfortunate one in dealing with a matter of this sort. These reserves had been conditionally made under the 350th clause of the Municipal Corporations Act, and in the 351st clause there was a special provision for the manner in which these temporary reserves should be dealt with by both Houses of the Legislature. It was, therefore, not fair to raise the question of whether these reserves should be confirmed or not by way of amendment, suddenly introduced, on a resolution which dealt with reserves of a totally different character from those provided for under the Municipal Corporations Act. The honorable member for Christchurch City said the reserve of 2,000 acres was quite inadequate for the City of Christchurch. In that he agreed with the honorable gentleman. That town had been deprived of its original reserves without receiving any adequate compensation. The amount reserved was small enough for smaller towns. He thought that, if the question was to be approached by the Legislature, it should be done by way of moving for a Committee, so that any one who objected to the reserves which had been temporarily made should have an opportunity of submitting and obtaining evidence on the subject, and so that the Committee might inquire into the special circumstances of the different towns affected. He did not think it was fair to tack to such a resolution as that of the honorable member for Bruce an amendment which might be held to fulfil the conditions of clause 351 of the Municipal Corporations Act, but which, while it fulfilled those conditions in the letter, certainly would not do so in the spirit of the Act. The evident meaning of the Act was that the reserves should be made temporarily; that the House should inquire into the circumstances of each separately, and confirm them or refuse them according as it might be found most convenient in each particular case—then the Government would make such reservations as were necessary under the circumstances: whereas if this resolution were passed it would be a refusal of the reserves that had been made, without any regard being paid to the particular circumstances; and that would lead to very serious damage to different boroughs, seeing that land sales were going on throughout the country, and that the towns would not be in the same position again as they were in this year. His constituents were interested in this question, because a reserve had been made for the Town of Kaiapoi, and he claimed a right to give evidence on the subject before a Committee, before the House dealt with the question in this general and summary manner. He might say that they had no endowments of any kind in that borough, although they had a very large expenditure thrown upon them owing to having a navigable river running through the town. There was scarcely any similar case in the country, for in other places where there was a navigable river running through the town there were either harbour endowments or other endowments for the purpose of improving the river; whereas at Kaiapoi there were no means of doing so except out of rates. He hoped the honorable gentleman who moved the amendment would see that it was not the right way to raise the question, and that any objection which an honorable member might have to any reserve temporarily made would be raised and considered on its merits by both Houses.

Mr. BURNS thought the remarks of the honorable member for the Waikato were quite uncalled for. That honorable gentleman had carried the Municipal Corporations Bill through last session: why did he not find out the objections to its provisions then, instead of raising them now? Coming from a gentleman of the honorable member's well-known legal ability, of course his opinions would have very great weight with the House; and he could not help saying that the honorable gentleman might have discovered the mistake last year, and kept the House right, and should not come down now after action had been taken under the Act, and attempt, by what might be called a side-wind, to upset a portion of the law. Of course the only way to proceed under the law would be to object by resolution to endowments as laid before the House. Great stress seemed to have been laid upon these endowments not being within the boundaries of the proposed boroughs. He could give an instance of a borough that had within its boundaries an endowment belonging to another borough; and, as far as he could read the Act, the borough in which it was situated could not even obtain rates from the property under the existing state of things. That seemed to be even a harder case than the proposal to give a borough Crown lands outside its own boundaries. There was no borough that he knew of that would be able to get such Crown lands now. Dunedin was certainly in a different position from many other boroughs, owing to the foresight of the original settlers of the province, who set aside endowments, and the city got possession of them through the action of the Provincial Council. He did not agree with the action of the Provincial Council; but that had nothing to do with the question—he did not wish to upset what had been done in accordance with law. Dunedin had an endowment many miles outside its own boundaries, and a very rich endowment it had become, owing to the rise in the value of property. Why should the House now, after passing the Act of last session, which allowed certain action to be taken, attempt to prevent these boroughs from getting what they were legally entitled to under the Municipal Corporations Act? Reservations had been made for other boroughs. For instance, an attempt was made to draw a comparison between other boroughs and Oamaru, which was undoubtedly very largely endowed; but the comparison did not hold good, because the endowments had been made by the Provincial Council. Therefore that did not show that any special favour had been shown to that borough, and the remarks of the honorable member for Waikato consequently did not bear upon the question. The law as it stood was perhaps a little too rigid, but, if the House wanted to approach the subject fairly, it should do so by amending the Municipal Corporations Act, and not by a side-wind. With regard to the amendment of the honorable member for Akaroa, he admitted that there was something unfair in the resolutions of the honorable member for Bruce. Why should the area of a county and the population of a borough be taken? There were no doubt counties, such as Wallace and Vincent, which were of large area but comparatively small population; but there were other counties with large populations, whose claims should be considered in this matter.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

NEW PLYMOUTH ENDOWMENT BILL.

Mr. KELLY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it had been introduced in consequence of a report made last session by the Public Petitions Committee recommending that certain reserves in New Plymouth should be handed over to the Town Commissioners. Although the town of New Plymouth had been largely endowed with reserves by the New Zealand Company, yet, owing to various causes, it had been deprived of the whole of those endowments.

Mr. Bowen

There were certain lands set apart as military reserves, and, as those reserves were now no longer required, the Public Petitions Committee recommended that they should be vested in the Borough Council. The Bill had been introduced to carry out the recommendations of the Committee, and with the view of doing some justice to the town.

Mr. GISBORNE wished to know whether the late Government approved of these military reserves being vested in the hands of the Corporation of New Plymouth.

Mr. KELLY said that he understood the late Government would have carried out the recommendation of the Committee, had it not been for the pressure of public business.

Mr. WHITAKER said that the late Government would not have consented to the handing over of the whole of these reserves to the Borough Council of New Plymouth.

Mr. GISBORNE said that, although, happily, New Plymouth was now exempt from Native disturbances, it might at some future time be subject to them, and these military reserves might be required for defence purposes. He thought it would be well if the Hon. the Defence Minister would take this matter into consideration. He would like to know whether the honorable gentleman consented to the alienation of the military reserves, and to the vesting of them in the Borough Council. Of course if they were vested in the Borough Council they would be leased to individuals, and might not be available for military purposes should they be unfortunately required at some future time. He wished to draw the attention of the honorable gentleman to that matter before the Bill went into Committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS said this Bill had been introduced, he understood, in consequence of a report brought up by the Public Petitions Committee last session. The Committee had gone fully into the case, and they found no objection to the reserves being utilized by handing them over to the Town Improvement Commissioners. He did not think they would ever be required for defence purposes, and they would be far better in the hands of the Corporation than if they were allowed to remain as at present. He believed the intention was that these reserves should be utilized for town improvements.

Mr. STOUT thought it would be better to set the reserves apart for recreation purposes, and not for leasing purposes. They should not allow all the reserves in the town to be built upon. He hoped the honorable gentleman who had moved the second reading of the Bill would consent to the reserves being set aside as public gardens or recreation grounds. He thought that was a proper use to which to put the reserves.

Mr. SHEEHAN understood the honorable member for Waikato to say that the late Government had not considered this matter. If they had remained in office a little longer they would no doubt have considered it favourably. For his own part, he was not disposed to agree to the granting of this land to the Borough Council; but he would consider the observations of the honorable member for Totara, and, before the Bill finally passed, he should state the views of the Government upon it. He presumed that the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill would not ask that it should be committed until tomorrow.

Major ATKINSON did not think that these reserves should be granted without further consideration. With regard to two of the reserves he thought the request made was reasonable and right, and the late Government would have assented to it; but he took exception to the granting of the Marsland Hill Military Reserve to the Borough Council. He thought the Government should carefully consider that matter. He believed that, should any disturbance arise, it would be very necessary to have a force stationed on Marsland Hill, and if the reserve were given away it would cause considerable inconvenience. There was no doubt that the Town of New Plymouth had been very badly used in having all its reserves taken away from it. He thought it would be very fair if the honorable gentleman in charge of the Bill would ask to have the reserves which had been taken away for education purposes given back. When the Constitution Act came into force the whole of the unsold sections of the town were made educational reserves, and it was left to the Provincial Council to apportion them out afterwards. It would be very fair indeed to give some of those reserves to the Borough Council, but he did not think the Government should part with the whole of the land situated near the harbour.

Mr. WHITAKER objected to the Marsland Hill Reserve being handed over, and would propose in Committee that it should be left out of the schedule. It was a military reserve, and those who knew New Plymouth must know that it was most important to retain it for that purpose. The country was now at peace: still, if any disturbance broke out, there was no place which was more likely to be troubled than New Plymouth; and this was a military position which ought not to be abandoned.

Mr. KELLY regretted that he had said to the House that the late Government had agreed to grant these reserves to the Borough of New Plymouth. He had had very little conversation with the late Ministers on the subject, but understood that there had been a correspondence between the Mayor and the late Government, who promised that a Bill should be brought in for the purpose of setting aside these endowments. As that was not done, he had brought in the present measure himself. With regard to the military reserve, he might say that it was only a portion of it that was required. Part of it was now in the possession of the Government, and was being used for a gaol and military post, and was still reserved for military purposes; and it was only the other part which was included in the Bill. The Borough Council were considering the question of giving a water supply to New Plymouth, and if they carried out that intention the part of the reserve included in the Bill would be required, and it would be absolutely necessary to hand it over to the borough authorities.

Bill read a second time.

On the question, That the Bill be committed presently,

Mr. REID said the honorable member for New Plymouth was labouring under a mistake if he believed that any agreement had been made with the Mayor of that town to vest the military reserve at Marsland Hill in the Corporation. The Mayor applied for all these reserves, but no promise was made to him that this particular reserve should be included, although there was a promise that a portion of it might be made available for the use of the borough, but for public purposes only. With regard to a Bill not being prepared, he might explain that at one time it was expected that the Public Reserves Bill would have enabled the Government to deal with all these reserves without the necessity for special measures. There were other cases besides this in which Bills had been held over in the expectation that that Bill would be passed in such a shape as to allow of transfers being made. As that anticipation was not realized, it was necessary to bring in special Bills.

Bill considered in Committee, reported to the House, and read a third time.

TIMARU HARBOUR BILL.

Mr. STAFFORD moved, That this Bill be read a second time, in order that it might be sent to the Waste Lands Committee.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR thought that some explanation should be given of the Bill. He knew it had become customary to say, "Send these Bills to the Waste Lands Committee, and then when they come back again we will discuss them;" but when they did come back honorable members were told, "You have admitted the principle in passing the second reading, and it is only waste of time to discuss the question now." He should like to know what was the duty of the Waste Lands Committee in regard to these Bills. They had seen a Bill introduced by the late Minister for Lands referred to that Committee, when the Committee thought it was their duty to consider the policy of the Bill, and to recommend this House not to pass it. He thought the duty of the Committee should be rather of a technical character, and to consider such questions as whether the land mentioned in the Bill agreed with the plans produced, and how far it was available for the intended purpose. If the Committee in this case held the opinion, which he believed was the legitimate one, that their functions were solely technical, and not political, they might report in favour of the Bill; whereas, individually, the members of the Committee might be opposed to it. The duty of the Committee ought, therefore, to be defined. He noticed that by this Bill it was proposed to make a gift to Timaru of £50,000, and that that place was further to be allowed to borrow £40,000. Now, during the recess, without vote of the House or of the Provincial Council, Timaru was given £100,000, upon the recommendation of the Superintendent. The whole history of these Timaru endowments was most interesting, and ought certainly to be explained. So far as an ordinary intelligence could see, upon the strength of a promise made by the Provincial Council some years ago to give this place £100,000, it had obtained £200,000. There had been £100,000 spent in Lyttelton and another £100,000 given to Timaru during the recess. He did not object to the localization of the Land Fund of Canterbury, but it certainly ought to be based upon some principle. It was not right that because a distinguished gentleman represented one place great gifts should be given to that place. The honor of being represented by such a distinguished gentleman as the honorable member for Timaru should of itself be a great benefit to the constituency, without the paltry consideration of £ s. d. He did not object to the localization of the Land Fund for the purposes of such local benefit as might produce colonial benefit also; but he found that a majority of members coming from Canterbury—not so much in the House of Representatives as elsewhere—had taken a different view of the matter, and refused all localization of the Land Fund for works of great benefit in districts on the other side of the Waitaki. It was in such cases that it was necessary to lay down a principle, because otherwise honorable members would be forced into undisguised log-rolling. There was no doubt that most stringent opposition was given, not in that House, but elsewhere, to works of great local benefit for which it was proposed to set aside local endowments. It was not necessary to go further back than to the history of a single day to bear him out in that statement, and that was a condition of things which, he thought, did not tend to elevate the position of either branch of the Legislature. There was one point with regard to this Bill which struck him particularly. The House had before it the Timaru Harbour Bill, and also a much more legitimate measure, which they would consider presently. Both these Bills would no doubt be passed, and the endowments provided for in them meant the taking away of a large quantity of land in the interior. He presumed that it must be in the interior, as there was no available land near Timaru at present. What precaution would be taken, when these lands were devoted to coastal purposes, that sufficient revenue for localization in the county would be left to make arterial roads? If there was one member in the House who, more than any other, had advocated the making of those roads it was the honorable member for Timaru; and yet, if a hundred thousand acres were to be taken from the interior and devoted to coastal purposes, where were they to get a Land Fund to make roads through those lands the revenues from which had been impounded? He would like to know whether the honorable member for Gladstone was favourable to land being devoted to this work, as it was very probable that it would have to be taken from that honorable gentleman's district. He did not, of course, speak out of any hostility to these harbours—he recognized that they were of almost primary importance; but he thought that, when a distinguished member of the House brought in a Bill of this kind, honorable members might ask him to lay down a clear principle which should guide them in such cases. They had eighteen of these Bills last year. The House would not say a word, but the present Native Minister and himself protested against the eighteen as they finally left the House, and honorable members consoled themselves that another branch of the Legislature would do its duty by the lot; and so it did. But in this case they were not sending up so many Bills of this kind to another branch, and they could not expect that other branch always to do the duty of looking into these measures, which they had not the moral courage to do themselves. Still, he hoped he would not be accused of offering any opposition to this measure that was not fair. He thought that before it left the House they ought to be favoured with a clear statement as to what was intended to be done at Timaru, whether they intended to construct a harbour or not, whether the two harbours within a few miles of one another would be constructed, and what provision was to be made for opening up the country, the produce of which could be taken to those harbours by making proper roads through it, and so giving facilities for settlement.

Mr. STAFFORD said the remarks of the honorable gentleman were very interesting, and he did not object at all to the questions he had raised. He only thought it was a matter for regret that the honorable gentleman singled out this particular Bill to lay down principles and express opinions, when there had already been seven or eight Bills of exactly the same character passed through the House this session, as to which the honorable gentleman had not said a single word. They had only a few minutes ago read a third time the Kakanui Harbour Bill, which gave a further endowment to that harbour.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR might be allowed to explain that that work was already constructed, and was a debt incurred by the province.

Mr. STAFFORD said, from what might be inferred as the logical meaning of the honorable gentleman's remarks, the country was to remain exactly as it was at present, and to construct no more works—that it was to take advantage of the machinery already in existence for constructing and commencing certain works; but that it was not to take similar machinery for any more such works, though they might assist to develop the country. The honorable gentleman was in error when he said that this Bill proposed to give power to borrow £40,000, besides setting aside 25,000 acres of land. If the honorable member took the trouble to read the Bill correctly, he would see that the £40,000 was only in the nature of a temporary advance upon the security of the land until the proceeds came in, and it was limited to a sum £10,000 less than the existing rate of sale would produce. Then, again, the honorable gentleman was also under a misapprehension as to the £100,000 already voted to Timaru. He understood the honorable gentleman to say that it had been done during the recess, without the sanction of the Provincial Council. Now, it was not done during the recess, and it was not done without the sanction of the Provincial Council. The Provincial Council twice voted that very sum; and when that sum had lapsed, when the Provincial Appropriations Extension Act expired, the General Assembly re-voted it, as a fulfilment of a vote which, certainly in two successive sessions if not in three, the Provincial Council had passed. Then, again, the honorable member mixed up this question with the Lyttelton Harbour; but there was no connection at all between the two places. He had that day been informed by the Premier that a Royal Commission had been appointed to consider the plans with reference to the works at Timaru. This Bill was simply a temporary aid which was given towards the execution of these works. As to the question which the honorable gentleman opened up of taking land which might be situated at some distance from the coast to endow harbour works, he could say this—and it appeared to him to be quite consonant with the principles he had ever held of giving most extreme facilities for intercommunication throughout the colony—that their railways and their roads would be of comparatively little use if, when they brought produce by those railways and those roads to the sea-coast, they had not some means of putting it on board ships; and he thought that every large system of railways ought to be connected with the harbour works to which those railways would run and at which would be shipped the produce conveyed by the railways. That appeared to him to be a necessary corollary to having main lines of railway. There was already before the Legislature a Bill for the extension of railways in this particular district in connection with Timaru by some similar means to those proposed in this Bill—that was to say, by setting apart the proceeds of certain blocks of land for the construction of these branch railways, which would not be nearly so efficient as they otherwise would be if there were no means of putting the produce they conveyed on board vessels.

DISQUALIFICATION BILL No. 1.

On the question, That this Bill be committed presently,

Mr. GISBORNE wished to know the course the Government were going to take with reference to this subject of disqualification. There was a Government Bill on disqualification before them, and also a Disqualification Bill introduced by a private member. Under which Bill were they to be disqualified in the future? He found that the Government Bill did not carry out the complete recommendation of the Committee, and only consisted of one clause. He wished to know whether the Government intended to press their Bill, or to adopt the Bill which was now before the House.

Mr. SHEEHAN said he was about to make a statement on the Bill when the honorable gentleman rose. The Disqualification Bill introduced by the Government was a purely technical Bill to remedy a defect in the existing law; but the measure before the House proposed a radical alteration in the existing law. It proposed, in effect, to abolish the disqualification law at present in force, and to disqualify only three classes of persons. He might say for himself that he was not prepared to accept this alteration. They could not go too far in securing absolute purity and independence on the part of members of that House. One of the most important provisions in the law which was now proposed to be repealed was that which prevented a member of the House from accepting office, emolument, or employment under the Government for a certain time after ceasing to be a member. They would remember perfectly well how, some years ago, there used to be vacancies in the House caused by members accepting Government offices at large salaries. It was to meet cases of that kind that the existing law was brought into force; and he thought the honorable member for New Plymouth ought to pause before seeking to abolish that law, and to leave it open to any Government in power either willingly to do these things or to be compelled to do them for the purpose of keeping in office. He believed that if they spoke out plainly in this matter it would be found that his honorable friends who had recently occupied the Ministerial benches must have felt in years gone by the importance and salutary effect of that provision, and that they would have been "cornered" by their supporters in the House had it not been for the fact that the law stood between them, and prevented their being able to strike a bargain that otherwise might have led to the resignation of a member and his appointment to a Government office. The time might again come when it would be important for a Government that it should not be open to this pressure. For his part, he thought that that part of the law which told a person who sought to come into the House, plainly and distinctly, "If you become a member of the Assembly of the colony, you must forfeit all chance of getting employment in a Government position for at least twelve months after you cease to be a member," was a fair and reasonable provision. Members came into Parliament cognizant of that fact, and knew that it was one of the conditions that attached to membership. The House ought to pause and consider very carefully before it decided to give up that position, and to fall back upon the old state of the law. There could be no doubt, of course, that, so far as the Bill before the House went, it was a very excellent measure, and contained desirable provisions regarding contractors and other classes of persons, which provisions, however, were in the existing law. He contended that the law they had at present was very much better than the one proposed in this Bill. The time would come when they would be able absolutely to effect this: that no person should be in that House, except as a Minister of the Crown, who should be concerned to the extent of twenty shillings in the revenue of the country. When they had people sitting in this House and in the other Chamber who had no personal interest to serve, and who were barred by a period of time like twelve months before which they could gratify their personal interest, then he thought they could look forward to the time when they would not be charging each other, as had been the case for the last few years, with log-rolling, and with getting through Bills by means not creditable to the House. For these reasons he might say at once that the Government could not see their way to support the Bill of the honorable gentleman. He had heard, both in the House and outside, that this proposition had met with a very great amount of favour. He was sorry for that. He asked the House now, having settled this law, having laid down for itself a course of practice which was a creditable one for the House, not, because of what might have happened this session or last session, or because there might have been questions of disqualification raised in the course of the last three or four months, to fly from one extreme to the other—to fly from a law which they now had, and which, to his mind, went in a proper direction, and to go back to a system which would lead the way to corruption and to the exercise of improper influence on the part of private members. He hoped the honorable gentleman would not press the Bill to a division, but, if he did, the Government would vote against him. Of course, it was a question for the House—it was not so much a Government question as a House question. It was a question how far honorable members were prepared to submit to certain conditions and limitations for the protection not only of their own independence and purity, but that of their fellow-members. If honorable members chose to depart from a principle of that kind, the fault and burden must lie on themselves; and, so far as the Government were concerned as a Government, they were prepared to abide by the existing law, and if they made a move it would be in the direction of making that law stricter and more complete in its application than it was at present.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY said that when the Bill was formerly before the House it was read a second time without discussion simply because the House desired to continue the want-of-confidence debate. The honorable member for New Plymouth should, therefore, in moving the motion for the committal of the Bill, have given some reason for desiring to change the system adopted last year. He would like to see the Bill of last year amended, so that it would disqualify those who were intended to be disqualified, and not those who were not intended to be disqualified. If they passed this Bill as it stood it would allow all the members of the House to accept office tomorrow if they chose to resign their seats. The Bill of last year was passed specially to prevent that being done, and he hoped the House would not alter its opinion now, unless some strong reasons for the change were advanced.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that the Government proposed to bring down a Bill which would operate in the direction pointed out by the Disqualification Committee, and if any further alteration in the existing law were required the whole subject could be discussed when the Government Bill came down. This Bill overturned the law completely. It excluded the large contractor, but it let in the smaller ones. He hoped the Bill would not go into Committee. It would be better to wait until the Government Bill was before the House, and then they could decide what alterations should be made.

Mr. REID said the question was undoubtedly a difficult one to deal with. He was sorry to hear such statements as had been given expression to as to the tone of morality in the House, as they indicated a state of things which, in the opinion of the honorable members who made those statements, they might expect to exist in the future. He was sorry to hear it said that such a Bill as the one now in force was a natural necessity to protect the Government from the demands of those members who expected to receive some consideration for their votes. He had been a member of the House for some years, and this was the first time that he had heard such a statement. If it was correct, it could not be made one moment too soon, but he was not aware that there ever had been many members of that class in the House. He remembered that it was proposed to constitute a Board of Works as part of the Public Works scheme—a provision which would have permitted members of the Assembly to accept positions on that Board of Works in their respective districts. That was a provision which he had strongly objected to. That provision, however, was struck out. The honorable gentleman who introduced it was very clever and astute, and he quietly shelved the proposal by saying that the Opposition had made such a virulent attack upon the scheme that he was compelled to abandon it. There was one great difficulty in connection with the disqualification question; and to exemplify that statement he need only refer to a case that had occurred within the past few days. There was a member of the House who was engaged in the coal trade, and an agent who acted for him in an adjoining province received a telegram from an employé of the Government asking at what price he was prepared to supply coal. The agent replied that he was prepared to supply it at a given price, and his offer was accepted. There was a contract made. The principal, who held a seat in this House, was not aware that such an arrangement had been made; but under the existing law he was liable to be disqualified, and might, for every day he sat after the contract was made, although in entire ignorance of its existence, be subjected to the penalties of the Disqualification Act. Was that a satisfactory condition of affairs? He contended that there should be some provision made whereby such contracts should not be held to disqualify a member; otherwise he failed to see where they were to get men to accept seats in that House. If the present law remained in force, members would have to be selected from among persons who were not engaged in any business in the country. Take the case of the Colonial Treasurer. He believed that that honorable gentleman was still doubtful as to whether he was not disqualified; and would any one say there was any corrupt motive in his case? If the law was so stringent as to disqualify members who entered into such contracts, the effect would be to prevent any man going into the House who was engaged in any extensive business. That was an unsatisfactory state of things. On the previous evening objection was made to the pastoral tenants, and, if they were to object to them and to merchants and other persons engaged in the various branches of business, it would not tend to improve the standing of the members who would be returned to the Legislature. The Provincial Councils had been able to carry on without such stringent disqualification laws, and he could not see that there was any great distinction between the composition of the General Legislature and the composition of the Provincial Councils. In the Provincial Council of Otago they had no Disqualification Act at all.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—What about the Road Boards?

Mr. REID said it did not follow that, because there was a Disqualification Act in the case of members of Road Boards, they should immediately adopt a similar principle here. It appeared to him that the House itself and the electors were quite competent to purify the Legislature. He had never heard of improper attempts being made to secure the vote of members of the Provincial Councils, and, if that were so in respect of a body constituted in that way, why should it not also apply to the General Legislature? From what he had seen, it seemed very probable that a great deal of time would be wasted in future in the discussion of this disqualification question. As it was said of the House of Commons during a certain period of the reign of George III., that the most animated discussions in those days were those relating to enclosures and Highway Bills, so it might truly be said of this House that the most important discussions that had taken place during the present session were those which related to questions of disqualification, questions of privilege, and points of order. These were the subjects which excited the greatest enthusiasm in debate, and if they were to continue it would be a good thing for the country and for Parliament that there should be no Disqualification Act at all. They would then be freed from those acrimonious discussions which had taken place on those subjects. If honorable members saw their way to pass a measure which would secure the purity of Parliament and prevent undue waste of time in dealing with the subject, he would not object; but an Act such as that referred to by the honorable member for Lyttelton, which would prevent any person having contracts under Government from holding seats, would very materially limit the choice of persons to be elected to the House, because men who were actively engaged in business throughout the country would not run the risk of being entrapped into contracts, and would abstain from taking seats in Parliament. The honorable member for Akaroa said "Hear, hear." The honorable gentleman had to undergo the ordeal of an inquiry before the Disqualification Committee, and he was sure he would not say that there was any connivance with the Government on his part. He was confident the honorable gentleman would admit he had not received anything in the shape of remuneration.

neration for his vote in the House; and his case ought to be an example. If the provisions of the Disqualification Act were to be so stringent, business men would have either to abandon their business or to relinquish all idea of holding seats in the House. For his own part, he thought the business men of the country were the men who should be in the House. He would not vote for or against the Bill, but would leave the question to be decided by those who thought it possible to frame a measure which would secure the purity of Parliament without doing injustice in individual cases.

Mr. MANDERS would not trouble the House at any length, as he was too unwell to do so. He would say that he quite agreed with the remarks of the honorable member for the Taieri as to the result that would follow upon a strict interpretation of the Disqualification Act. He (Mr. Manders) had for years been connected with bankrupt estates in the district he came from. He had been, however, obliged to give up that branch of his business, as he would, if acting as trustee, be receiving fees—not indeed from the Governor, but from the estate. The fees, however, were sanctioned by the Debtors Act; and if he so acted as Accountant in Bankruptcy he became disqualified to hold a seat in this Chamber, though those fees could not influence his political opinions. The same disability operated in the case of those who held the position of Returning Officer or Deputy-Returning Officer, if any money consideration were involved. These were cases of hardships that the Disqualification Act entailed. He could not vote for the Bill of the honorable member for New Plymouth. The law had better remain as it was for another year. It was very desirable that the whole subject should be dealt with next session, in order to arrive at a result which would place the question in a more satisfactory position.

Mr. MURRAY said the honorable member for the Taieri seemed to have a great aversion to any Disqualification Act being passed. The honorable gentleman seemed to think the members of that House were so exceptional in their purity that they were altogether beyond contagion. The Disqualification Act was not passed to punish the just. Its object was to punish those who were guilty of improper actions. Whatever honorable members might say, there were members who had retired from that House not altogether without a just imputation being cast upon their motives. He could point to a dozen members, some quite as honorable as the gentlemen who sat on the Opposition benches, who had retired from high positions in the House and accepted lucrative positions in the Civil Service. There were members in the House now who had done that; and, if this session had been so much taken up with questions of privilege and disqualification, there was all the more necessity why the law should be made clear on the subject. If they were afraid that their servants would put them in the position of breaking the law, all they had to do was to put up a notice in their offices to the effect that if they entered into any contracts without the knowledge of their employers they would be dismissed from their employment, as was done by his honorable friend beside him, the member for Akaroa, who, in 1875, was brought under the provisions of the Disqualification Act through the action of his servants; but that was not likely to occur again. The honorable member for the Taieri had said that no question of disqualification had ever arisen in the Provincial Council of Otago. Well, before Southland was reunited to the Province of Otago there were forty members of that Council. Perhaps the honorable gentleman had, in his earlier years, read a story in which forty persons played a prominent part. He held that, so long as they had Parliaments of five years' duration, it was absolutely necessary that members should not be beyond the reach of their constituents. He trusted that the honorable member for New Plymouth would not press this Bill on, because he felt sure that it would not remedy the evil, but would rather increase it. He thought that the slight addition to the existing Act proposed by the Government would meet all the difficulties of the case. They should not encumber the Statute Book with any unnecessary Acts. He hoped that the Bill of the honorable member for New Plymouth would not be passed.

Mr. KELLY said that he wished to make a few remarks in addition to those he had made when moving the second reading of the Bill. The intention of the Bill was not wholly to purify Parliament, because no Bill could do that; only a wholesome public opinion would have any effect in that direction. It was evident that the present Disqualification Act was not a satisfactory measure. First of all, it was unsatisfactory on account of the provision it made that no person who received any money directly or indirectly from the Crown could hold a seat in the General Assembly, the principle being carried too far. He quite agreed that no officer of the Crown who was paid an annual salary or who was paid out of money appropriated by Parliament should hold a seat. The Bill now before the House dealt with the matter in a very simple way. It said that—"No person, except as hereinafter specially provided, accepting or holding any office under or from or at the appointment or nomination of the Crown, or Governor of New Zealand by virtue of his office, to which any annual salary is attached, and paid out of money appropriated by Parliament for such salary, shall be capable of being summoned to or of holding a seat in the Legislative Council, or of being elected to serve as a member of the House of Representatives, or of sitting or voting as a member either of the said Council or the said House during the time he holds such office."

The next question that arose was whether a contractor should hold a seat in the House. He did not think that any honorable member would hold that the present law regarding contractors was a satisfactory one. In fact, if the spirit of the present law was carried out several gentlemen who now held seats in the House would be disqualified. The Act at present in force provided that any person who entered into a contract with the Government was disqualified; but it was necessary to define contracts. It might happen that merchants and traders who were members might sell small quantities of goods to the Government, and thus be brought under the provisions of the Act unknowingly. He thought it would be admitted that this was not a satisfactory state of things. Then came the point raised by the Hon. the Native Minister—namely, that persons could not accept office under the Government until they had ceased to be members of the House for twelve months. The present Bill did not propose to deal with that question. The Act now in force allowed all the members of the Executive Government, the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament, the Chairmen of Committees, and the Superintendents of provinces to take office under the Crown without being subject to any penalty, and thus there were about thirty persons who held seats in Parliament who were exempt from the provisions of the present Act as regards accepting appointments within twelve months from the time they ceased to be members. He would not take up the time of the House any longer, and, as he did not intend to abandon the Bill, he was prepared to take a division on it immediately. He moved, That the Bill be ordered to be committed presently.

Question put, "That the Disqualification Bill be ordered to be committed presently;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

SOUTH DUNEDIN RESERVES BILL.

Mr. SEATON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the land referred to in the schedule was given as an endowment to the South Dunedin Municipality by the late Superintendent of Otago. It was almost a necessity to the existence of the people who lived in that municipality, and the House would thoroughly understand the position in which the residents were placed if he gave a short sketch of the physical features of the locality. There were three municipalities, whose area extended over about three miles by three miles, and this spot was bounded by a range from which immense quantities of water came down after a short rain, covering the land with water, and occasionally doing much damage. The Municipality of South Dunedin wished to utilize this reserve for the purpose of constructing works by which the water should be carried off. There was only a fall of some fifteen or sixteen inches in the three miles, so that the water remained on the ground for a considerable length of time. It was proposed to make a reservoir of this ten acres of land, and to construct works by which the water gathered in this lake would be carried off and the country left free from the flood-waters which at present flowed over it. It was proposed, among other things, to erect a steam-engine or windmill, by means of which the water could be pumped off; but, at any rate, this land was to be the receptacle into which the flood-water would flow. Some few years ago this land was an impassable swamp, and not even a dog could cross it without being bogged. Now there were a number of large buildings erected over the place in concrete and timber, but sometimes, when a flood came on, the place had the appearance of a large sea. Unless some such scheme as he had referred to were carried out, it would be utterly impossible for people to live on that flat. The Municipality should be enabled to make some provision for the sewage and drainage of the flat, and that was the sole object of the Bill. At the beginning of the session he put a question to the Attorney-General, and was assured by him that no Crown grant for the land had been issued. There were two Public Health Bills before the House this session, but neither of them was of half the importance that the measure the second reading of which he now moved was to the inhabitants of that locality.

Mr. McLEAN did not rise for the purpose of disputing anything the honorable gentleman had stated. He simply wished to point out that the Bill would not answer the purpose intended by the honorable gentleman. The preamble would require to be altered, so as to recite the withdrawal of the Crown grant from the Harbour Board, and then a clause would have to be inserted in the Bill, transferring the land from the Harbour Board to the Municipality. He did not think the House would consent to withdraw from any public body land which had already been granted to it. This land had been granted to the Harbour Board as an endowment. The Superintendent had made a promise to grant the land through a misunderstanding. He (Mr. McLean) believed the Crown grant had been issued to the Harbour Board, and he was sure the House would not be a party to repealing a Crown grant without giving notice to the parties interested. He would therefore move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. MACANDREW said the honorable member for Waikouaiti had stated that the ten acres of land on this flat had been granted to the Municipality by the late Superintendent of Otago through a misunderstanding. There was no misunderstanding whatever in the matter. At the time the Superintendent of Otago reserved this land from sale it was Crown land.

Mr. McLEAN did not say that the Superintendent had ever granted the land. He only made a promise, but the land had never been granted at all.

Mr. MACANDREW said the Superintendent had no power to grant the land absolutely, but he had power legally to reserve it from sale, with the view of its being dealt with by the Provincial Council at its next sitting. It happened, however, that the Provincial Council did not meet after the land was reserved, and the transaction was never legally completed. The Superintendent, with the advice and consent of the Executive Council, reserved it from sale in the usual way for the purpose of granting it as an endowment to this Municipality. He could not understand how the land came to be granted by this House to the Harbour Board. Certainly the Municipality had a prior right to it. Had the Provincial Council been in session there was not the slightest doubt there would have been an Ordinance passed confirming the reservation of the land as an endowment to the Municipality of South Dunedin. The Harbour Board had no right or title whatever to the land. Prior to 1876 the land was reserved by the Superintendent, with the advice and consent of his Executive Council. It was then Crown land. There was an officer in Wellington now who could give evidence on the subject—Mr. McKerrow, the Assistant Surveyor-General. He recollected referring the matter to that gentleman, and receiving from him a description of the land. If the House had granted the land to the Harbour Board it had done so unjustly, and the sooner it retraced its step the better. This piece of land was absolutely required, as stated by the honorable member for Caversham, for sanitary purposes. If the land had already been granted to the Harbour Board, the preamble of the Bill would have to be altered. He was not, however, aware that it had been Crown-granted, but he was certain of this: that at the time the reserve was made by the Superintendent it was Crown land.

Mr. REID said there seemed to be some misconception with regard to this matter. He had no recollection of this land having been reserved. He knew that the Waste Lands Board refused to deal with it at all, on the ground that it was not Crown land, but that it was part of the land below high-water mark. The Hon. the Minister for Lands would recollect that the Provincial Executive were anxious to have this land classed as Crown land, and that a very accurate survey of the land was made with the view of getting it placed under that category. He believed the Chief Commissioner of the Waste Lands Board refused to recognize it as Crown land. He looked upon it purely as part of the land below high-water mark, which could only be dealt with by the Crown. That was the reason why the recommendation of the Superintendent had not been dealt with by the Board. Of course they could only speak of these matters as the recognized bodies which dealt with them treated them. In the meantime the land had been granted to the Harbour Board. It had never been granted to the Municipality. No matter what the description of the land given in the schedule was, he was satisfied that the land had been granted to the Harbour Board. Although the Crown grant might not have been issued, the land had been practically granted. Any person entitled to a grant looked upon it as being as good as if it were issued, and if this grant had not been issued the non-issue was certainly through delay in the office. The land should be treated as if the Crown grant had been issued. He could not say whether this land was required by the Municipality for the purpose stated. He had never heard that that was the object. He understood that it was for the purpose of creating a revenue from it. From what he knew of the subject, he understood that the main object was to obtain revenue from it, and to prevent the Harbour Board having any land between them and the harbour. They thought that it might be valuable for shipping and for wharves, and that it might become a very valuable estate to them. But even if the land were required for the purpose stated, in order to make a reservoir to collect the water, certainly ten acres would be quite unnecessary. One acre would make a very large reservoir, the water from which could be pumped out by an engine or windmill. He thought the House would act wisely in not passing the Bill.

Mr. BURNS said the House would perhaps bear with him a few minutes while he gave a history of this matter, which he was in a better position to do than any other honorable member in the House. Many years ago, before there was a single house on the flat, nay, before the flat was all sold, a number of gentlemen among whom he was met one day at the Gasworks to consider what should be done with regard to the drainage of this land. At that time the land was in the hands of not more than half a dozen men, and he, although not personally interested, was acting for others with regard to it. They agreed at that meeting to get the late Mr. Balfour to prepare plans and estimates for certain works on this flat. Mr. Balfour did so, and the plans cost some £60 or £70, of which he (Mr. Burns) had to pay £25, for which he had not up to the present time received one shilling. The plan proposed was that this very piece of land now being considered by the House should be taken as a reservoir, and that it should extend down to below low-water mark, being of a triangular shape, and meeting the water at what was then known as Goat Hill. It was proposed that a bank should be thrown across, that a pipe should be laid down as low as possible below low-water mark, and that the land enclosed by the bank should be used as a reservoir. The plans were prepared, and left in the hands of Mr. E. B. Cargill, who was to see the then Superintendent, the same gentleman who was lately Superintendent, and who, he believed, agreed that the land should be reserved for the purpose. He (Mr. Burns) went away, and the property passed from his control, and he did not trouble himself any more about it. About a year and a half ago, inquiries were made about the matter, and he believed the plans were now in possession of one of the Corporations. It would be found that the Otago Harbour Board had got this piece of land in error. It was possible that they might have a grant for it, and he was bound to believe the honorable member for the Taieri when he said that this piece was in the grant; but, if so, it was put there in error, and the House would do no injury whatever to the Harbour Board by correcting the grant, as there was power to do under the Crown Grants Act. If any one had a title to that piece of land, it was the original proprietors of the flat, which was now vested in the South Dunedin Corporation. Whether the House passed the Bill or not, it would be doing no injury to the Otago Harbour Board by taking this ground, for the Board should never have had it. Looking at this as a purely sanitary matter, the House would do well to consider whether it should not take the land from the Harbour Board. If that were not done, he saw great difficulties looming in the way of the Corporations getting its land drained. It was all very well to talk about high-water mark. He had known high-water mark to exist very nearly up to the Forbury Hills, so that it was folly to say where high-water mark was; and, if the Board claimed the land up to that mark, they might just as well say they claimed the whole flat. The House would be doing a great injury by throwing the Bill out. He would have liked to say a great deal more upon the subject, but he was really not in a state of health to do so.

Mr. REYNOLDS might say that the whole of South Dunedin was built on private property, and when he was in the Provincial Government the application referred to by the honorable member for Roslyn was refused, and it was then found that the Provincial Government had no power of dealing with it. Since 1866, however, the land comprising South Dunedin had been disposed of in small allotments, and a township created. But that was not the question. The question was, that in 1875 the Assembly passed the Otago Harbour Board Empowering Act, and there were then deposited in the Public Works Office certain plans which showed that this land was granted to the Harbour Board. He believed the Crown grant had been issued, and imagined that the honorable gentleman who introduced the Bill was aware that such was the case, and had received letters from South Dunedin saying that he was too late with his Bill.

Mr. SEATON.—The honorable member is entirely wrong. I have received no such letters.

Mr. REYNOLDS was under the impression that the honorable member had received a letter from South Dunedin or St. Kilda saying that he was too late with his Bill, seeing that this land was already the property of the Harbour Board. If, however, the honorable gentleman said he had not received such letters, he must take his word for it. The position was simply this: that, even if the land were not Crown-granted, still, by the Act of 1875, it was the property of the Otago Harbour Board, and to take it away from that body now would only be on a par with the action of the House in taking the wharves and quays reserves from the City of Dunedin, and handing them over to the Harbour Board.

Mr. RICHARDSON thought it would be better to delay this Bill until the honorable member in charge of it was in a position to state authoritatively to whom the land at present belonged, or in whom it was vested. He was certain, from the description of the land in the schedule to this Bill, that it was in the plan attached to the Otago Harbour Board Empowering Act as having been given to that body. The House would, therefore, not be right in going on with the Bill until it knew exactly what it was doing in the matter.

Mr. REES did not think there was any necessity for delay if the statements made by the honorable gentleman who introduced the Bill were correct, and they had been completely corroborated by the honorable member for Roslyn and the late Superintendent of Otago. It would be wise to proceed with the matter at once, even supposing the land was granted to the Harbour Board. If the Superintendent had set aside this land for the purpose to which it was now proposed to devote it, the House should confirm that act. There was a matter paramount in interest, and that was the health of the suburb. The honorable member for the Taieri said that, as far as he knew, this land had not been granted, because it was not Crown land; but it must be to some extent Crown land, or it could not have been given to the Harbour Board. The late Superintendent of the province said he had reserved it before that time, and the honorable member for the Taieri, speaking of the operations of the Waste Lands Board, said that the reservation and the grant were about concurrent.

Mr. REYNOLDS could inform the honorable gentleman that the Bill passed the House in 1875, and that it was at the end of 1875 or beginning of 1876 that the Superintendent asked that the land should be reserved.

Mr. REES said there was evidently a misunderstanding between the honorable member for Port Chalmers and the late Superintendent. But, whichever way it went, there ought not to be any feeling in the matter, as, under any circumstances, the land was public property.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—No.

Mr. REES.—The honorable member might say "No," because he contended that it was granted to the Harbour Board. Between them it would be the property of the public, because the Board was only a number of gentlemen banded together for the public interest. No consideration entered into this matter except that of the welfare of the people immediately concerned, and the health of the people was of far more importance than any matter connected with the Harbour Board. If it were necessary for the public health of a growing suburb of a great city, and if the statements of the honorable member for Caversham were correct, he would ask the House to agree to the proposal of that honorable gentleman. The health of the people in the large towns of the colony was not attended to as it ought to be.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY would like to ask whether this was not part of the endowments which the Harbour Board had included in the security that they had given for money raised by debentures. If that were so, they would be damaging the whole credit of New Zealand by giving endowments to bodies, and then transferring them to other bodies after money had been raised upon them.

Mr. MACANDREW, in reply to the honorable member, said the land was reserved in 1875 by the Superintendent, and was granted under the authority of an Act passed by the General Assembly in 1876, since which no debentures had been floated by the Harbour Board.

Mr. McLEAN thought the Act passed in 1876 was a general Act, and that this land was reserved under the Act of 1875.

Mr. GISBORNE had the Act of 1875 before him. He thought it a most dangerous precedent to vest land in a Board in one session and then to divest that Board suddenly of that land and transfer it to another body, regardless of any vested interests that might have accrued in the meantime. He did not know where this land was situated—whether it came under the 4th section of the Otago Harbour Board Empowering Act or not. That Act stated,—

"And whereas certain lands forming part of the foreshore of the said Port of Dunedin have been granted by the Crown to the Superintendent: . . . . It is therefore hereby enacted that all the lands so granted to the Superintendent as aforesaid upon the trust aforesaid, excepting such portions thereof as have been legally disposed of, shall be and they are hereby transferred to and vested in the said Board, to be held by the said Board on the like trusts and for the like purposes as the same are now held by the Superintendent; and the Superintendent shall, upon the request of the said Board, execute all necessary conveyances and assurances in law for conveying and assuring to the said Board the reserves hereinbefore mentioned: Provided that all reserves hereby vested in the Board shall be subject to any mortgage, lease, or other charge or incumbrance now subsisting upon the same or any part or parts thereof."

Therefore, for all the House knew, these lands might have been mortgaged for moneys borrowed by the Board, and by passing this Bill they might be lessening the security for the moneys lent, and vesting the lands in another Board for a different purpose. Of course, in the absence of information, he did not like to say positively that this was the case. But the Bill, he thought, should be postponed in order that honorable members might have more exact information on this important point. If the Bill were pressed to a division, with the information he had before him he would be obliged, on the same principle on which he had voted on the Otago Harbour Board Reserves Bill, to vote against this measure.

Mr. WHITAKER said it seemed to him to be a very dangerous thing to deal with property in the way in which it was proposed to deal with the land in this case. He quite agreed with the reasons given by the honorable member for Caversham to prove that this was a piece of land which ought to have been granted to the South Dunedin Corporation, it being required for the purpose of securing the public health, and very probably it might be a mistake, in granting this land, to give it to the Harbour Board; but, having done so, not knowing whether or not it was included in certain securities which the Harbour Board had given when raising money, and being altogether uncertain as to the position of it, it would be a very injudicious thing for the House to deal with the land in the manner proposed. He had on several occasions seen that there was a disposition to transfer property from one public body to another without the party from whom the land was to be taken being heard. The Harbour Board might be able to give sufficiently good reasons why it should continue to have this land—better reasons, perhaps, than those given by the honorable member for Caversham for taking it away; but honorable members were in the dark as to all these matters, and he thought the question should be postponed, in order that they might have clear and certain information as to what they were asked to do.

Mr. SEATON said there had been a great many objections raised to this particular piece of land being granted to the Municipality of South Dunedin, but he did not think that one of them was applicable to the case. The honorable member for the Taieri said that the land was below high-water mark. Now, any one reading the description of the land as it appeared in the schedule would find that that was not the case.

Mr. REID explained that what he had said was that there had been a dispute between the then Superintendent of the Province of Otago, who recognized this as Crown land and wished it to be treated as such, and the Chief Commissioner of the Waste Lands Board, who would not recognize it as anything but land below high-water mark. He (Mr. Reid) had not expressed his own opinion upon the matter. The land had been left out in the original survey, and considered as land that had not been set apart as Crown land, and the department refused to recognize it as other than land below high-water mark.

Mr. SEATON accepted the honorable gentleman's explanation, but at the same time that did not touch the matter in dispute at all. Honorable members who were in the last Parliament at the time this particular endowment was given would agree that it was understood to be entirely below high-water mark, and that the Board was to be allowed to deepen the harbour and to deposit the material taken from the bottom of the harbour on this particular piece of land, and so reclaim it. If the land had been included in the Crown grant, it must have been in error, because, as he said before, the endowment was given to be reclaimed. If land above high-water mark had been given, it clearly must have been in error; and they had the assurance of the late Superintendent that, previous to its being Crown-granted, it was set aside for the benefit of this particular municipality. He did not know if he was properly understood, when moving the second reading, that this municipality was not more particularly affected than two other municipalities, but that it happened to be the particular outlet for the drainage. Consequently there were three municipalities interested in this particular reserve. The honorable member for Lyttelton wanted to know if debentures had been issued by the Harbour Board upon the security of this land. He thought that the honorable gentleman's own judgment should show him that no money would be lent on land that was not reclaimed—land which had no existence, and which was entirely under water. Therefore it was quite clear that no money could have been borrowed upon the security of this land. If the second reading were agreed to, he would have no objection to postpone the committal until that day week, so that honorable members might satisfy themselves as to the propriety of the Bill.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

ONEHUNGA CEMETERY.

Mr. O'RORKE asked the Premier, Whether the Government have succeeded in acquiring a burying-ground sufficiently near to Onehunga to enable the Church of England Cemetery, used as a public cemetery, in the centre of the town, to be closed? He drew the attention of the late Government to this matter at the beginning of the session, and received an answer that negotiations were pending with regard to a suitable cemetery not only for Onehunga, but also for Auckland and the neighbourhood generally. He did not know whether negotiations were still pending, but he did know that this was a matter of great urgency. The cemetery at Onehunga was almost completely filled up, and great inconvenience would arise from the want of room; and besides there was the danger that might arise to the public health from intramural burying. This cemetery was in the very centre of the town.

Sir G. GREY replied that the Government were quite aware of the importance of the subject, but, unfortunately, they had not yet been able to ascertain where a suitable burial-ground could be found for Onehunga.

DISQUALIFICATION BILL No. 2.

Sir G. GREY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to insert in the existing Disqualification Act the words, "or of sitting or voting in the said Council or House," which were evidently omitted from the Act now in operation.

Mr. REYNOLDS was exceedingly sorry that the Government had not brought down a measure to deal with the whole question in a more satisfactory manner. The present Disqualification Act, as they had seen during the present session, was simply a trap to catch members of the House. There had been many cases where the law had been broken without the least intention to break it, and, had it not been for the fact that there was a mistake in the Act passed last year, he knew of three or four members who would have been disqualified, himself included. A short time ago he became proprietor of a newspaper—the Otago Daily Times—which had a contract with the Government; but he knew nothing whatever of the existence of the contract. He took over the obligations of the late company, and the result would have been that, but for the mistake in the Act, he would have come under the operation of the Disqualification Act, and, without knowing it, would have lost his seat in the House, in addition to becoming liable to a penalty of £100 a day for every day he sat in the House after becoming the purchaser of the newspaper. Then there was another case. He happened to be a part proprietor of the steamer "Easby," but the number of proprietors was not sufficient to exempt the owners from the penalties of the Disqualification Act. Had one of the Government steamers gone alongside the "Easby" and taken a load of coal, he would have been liable to any penalties which the Act imposed. Then there were other cases. For example: the honorable member for Waikato had coaches running in the Province of Otago, and under the Act as proposed to be amended he could not carry the mails unless he forfeited his seat in this House; and there was no way of getting the mails conveyed except by his coaches, so that the Government were really placed in a difficulty by the existence of such an Act as the one now on the Statute Book as proposed to be amended. No one had been more anxious than he had been to get a Disqualification Act passed, and the existing Act was passed, he believed, mainly through his agitating the matter in several sessions; but he was beginning to see that, if they were to have a Disqualification Act at all, it must be of a different character from the existing one. It would not do for a member of the House to forfeit his seat and to be liable to be sued for penalties to the extent of £100 a day unless he were knowingly a party to a contract such as was contemplated under the Act. He thought the proper course would be to leave these matters for a Judge of the Supreme Court to decide whether there was a case or not, and, if he decided that there was a case, the Speaker should be instructed to take action against the offending member. He hoped the House would not pass the Bill, because it would only make the present Act more objectionable than it was before. He moved, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. WHITAKER said the effect of passing this Bill would be to disqualify several members who were not disqualified at the present time. The question was, whether or not the House should take retrospective action. If they were going to do that, it should be thoroughly understood. Honorable members would then know what they were about. When the case of Mr. Kennedy came on, the Committee who heard it recommended that a certain alteration in the law should be made. Amongst others was the alteration proposed to be made by this Bill; but there were others which he thought of as much importance, and he was sorry the Government had not seen their way to cover those cases as well as the cases which were proposed to be covered by this Bill. One great inconvenience arising from the state of the existing law was this: that the House might investigate cases, as it had done, and might come to the conclusion that a member was not disqualified, and he might continue to sit; but there was another tribunal that had power to determine the same question. The House might declare that a member was not ineligible or disqualified, but an action might still be brought in the Supreme Court to recover penalties. That was a condition of things which ought not to exist. There should be one tribunal to try such questions, and that tribunal should determine them for all purposes. The following was a portion of the report of the Disqualification Committee which was brought up when he was Chairman of the Committee and a member of the Government:—

"That the Committee believe that it was the intention of the Act to disqualify members who might become contractors with the Government in the same way as 'The Disqualification Act, 1870,' provided; and the Committee would urge, if the Legislature so intend, that the seventh section of the Act be slightly amended by the insertion of the words 'or of holding a seat or serving' immediately after the words 'elected to serve' in the seventeenth line of the seventh section."

The Bill which was now brought in provided for that—it was in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee; but when the Committee were sitting it was not suggested that the insertion of the words referred to in the way they had been inserted would have the effect of disqualifying members who were now sitting in the House. The case of the honorable member for Waikato (Mr. Bastings) had been referred to. He apprehended that, as the honorable gentleman was now holding a contract with the Government for the carriage of mails, he would be disqualified if the Bill became law. The honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Kennedy) would also possibly be disqualified, and there were several other members of the House who might find themselves in the same position. Therefore, when they were passing an Act relating to this subject, they should take care that it should not be retrospective in its action. He held that, except in cases of great urgency, legislation should never be retrospective. The Committee also recommended, "That a resolution of either House, declaring a seat not to be vacant in the House passing such resolution, should bar all proceedings in the Supreme Court against the member concerned." That report having been adopted by the House, he took steps to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. He took no direct steps in the matter himself, for obvious reasons, but he gave instructions to the Solicitor-General to draw a Bill in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee. He was of opinion that the best way of testing the matter would be in the Supreme Court. The best course would be to appoint a Committee to take all the evidence necessary, and then transmit it to the Supreme Court for the decision of one or more of the Judges, and that then the penalty should be enforced or not in accordance with the decision arrived at. It would obviously be wrong that honorable members should be fined for taking their seats in the House when they were ignorant of the fact that they had been brought under the provisions of the Disqualification Act, and when the House decided that their seats were not vacated. If the question on both points were remitted to the Supreme Court all party bias would be got rid of, and a far more correct conclusion could be arrived at by the Judges than by the House. He was sorry the Government had not seen their way to deal with the question in the manner that had been suggested. He moved in the matter now because he was not satisfied with the Bill in the shape in which it had been introduced. To his mind it was unsatisfactory, because it was retrospective in its action on the one hand, and did not contain the recommendations of the Committee on the other hand.

Mr. BARFF did not intend to vote against the second reading of the Bill, but was greatly dissatisfied with the manner in which the Government proposed to deal with the question. He had hoped that they would take steps to put the Disqualification Act in a more satisfactory position than it was in now. On more than one occasion previously, he had stated that he believed the Disqualification Act was merely a man-trap, a trap to catch the unwary and the innocent, while, at the same time, those who ought to be disqualified under the law were allowed to sit as members of the House. In his opinion there were only two classes of persons to whom the Disqualification Act should apply—namely, those who were contractors with the General Government, and those who were permanent Civil servants. Apart from those classes, he thought the good sense of the House would prevent any serious trespass on the purity of Parliament. It was almost impossible for at least one-half of the members of the House to steer clear of the difficulties that beset them in connection with the present law. Only yesterday an honorable member had told him that he was very nearly disqualified through having promised to become security for a man who had a Government contract. That honorable gentleman had not the slightest idea that he would be disqualified by so doing, and there could be no doubt that many honorable members would have been disqualified if the provisions of the Act had been enforced. He was satisfied that fully one-half of the members of the House were in a state of uncertainty as to whether they were disqualified or not. He objected to the Bill in its present form, because he thought it was not right to deal with one special case, as the Bill proposed to do. He would vote against the Bill altogether unless the Government saw its way to amend it considerably. He held that such a Bill as this should apply to all cases, and not only to that of one individual member. It was well known to honorable members—in fact, it was plainly stated last year—that the Disqualification Bill was introduced as a piece of personal spite against one honorable member of the House. That was a matter of gossip then, but it was a matter of conviction now to those honorable members who had taken the trouble to study the provisions of the Bill. As that Bill was in such an imperfect form, he thought it was incumbent upon the Government to endeavour to make it a workable measure, instead of allowing it to remain on the Statute Book simply as a trap for the unwary.

Mr. REES said that he had dissented from the report of the Committee when it was brought up. He thought that either the late Government or the present one ought to have endeavoured to make the Disqualification Bill a much better measure than it was, though he could not see how anybody could have hoped that the Bill would have acted beneficially if it had been passed. Several honorable members had pointed out that, supposing the Bill now before them became law, many honorable gentlemen, without knowing that they had done any wrong, would suddenly become disqualified from sitting in the House or taking part in its deliberations. It was never intended that the Disqualification Act should be applied in that way. He hoped the Government would not press the second reading of the Bill. It was the duty of the Government to bring the matter before the House after the report of the Committee had been adopted, but he hoped that at this late period of the session the House would not alter the existing law. The session had now so short a time to run that the Bill, even if passed by the House, could not receive the Royal assent in time, and therefore it would be absolutely inoperative during the present session. If the Bill were passed there would be this difficulty: that some members, after the House rose, might become disqualified under the Bill, and they might, without knowing that they were guilty of any wrong, come and sit here next session, and suddenly find themselves in the intricate meshes of the law, and suffer heavy loss. He trusted the Premier would not enforce the passing of this Bill. He might say that last year there was a long discussion on the second reading of the Disqualification Act; and, though he argued in favour of one part of the Bill, he had not then looked carefully into other parts of it, and he was astonished now, when he came to read the Act carefully through, to find that it contained such provisions as it did. He was not at all desirous of seeing an apple of discord cast upon the floor of the House; and it seemed to him that, if it became law, it would be simply an apple of discord. He hoped that, as the session was now so far advanced, no change would be made in the existing law. No harm could result from leaving it over until next session, and no good could come from changing the law this session. It would be better to leave the Government to deal with the subject next session.

Sir R. DOUGLAS said it was with great regret that he noticed last night that the Disqualification Bill introduced by the honorable member for New Plymouth was thrown out. He looked upon it in this way: Every honorable member of the House was sent to the House by his constituents, who knew what he was and what he would do for them. If there were no Disqualification Act the constituencies would judge those persons who sought to represent them on their merits, but if there were a Disqualification Act they would say, "The Assembly protects us." He did not think that the Assembly should protect the constituencies from the actions of their members. If the constituencies chose to send to the House men who were capable of being bought or sold, they themselves should suffer. It was true that the whole country would suffer; and he ventured to say that when the country began to suffer in the least they would take care to send to Parliament their best men, honorable men, men they could trust, and who would vote with perfect freedom on any question that came before Parliament. He objected to the Disqualification Act altogether. He thought that only Civil servants and contractors should be excluded from the House. It was well known to members of the House and to the people outside that, if they had a Government on the Treasury benches so bad that they would choose to bribe members of the House, and if members were to be bribed, the Government could do it, and it would be in the power of no Disqualification Act to prevent it. So that the Disqualification Act was in that respect simply a farce. He could hardly characterize such a Disqualification Act in the language he should like to apply to it. There was no expression that he could use bad enough to apply to an Act brought in to save the purity of Parliament. Parliament should be pure on its own account. No Disqualification Act could make the people do right. No Act ever passed would make the people right and proper in their conduct. He thought the whole subject of the Disqualification Act should be very carefully considered. He would vote against this Amendment Bill, and if he had not paired on the previous night he would have voted against the Bill brought in by the honorable member for New Plymouth. He would ask, were members of Parliament not peculiarly fitted to fill appointments which the Government had it in its power to give? Were not members looking forward to those appointments if they served their country well; and were they not perfectly justified in so doing? In the English Parliament men were chosen on account of their long Parliamentary experience for many positions which they held in the service of their country. He could not see that New Zealand alone should be an exception in that respect. It was true that the Government wished to be saved from having pressure brought to bear on them. If a Government were honest they would resist pressure, and there were men in the House who would resist pressure. He should vote against this Amendment Bill and against any Bill of the kind. The people must learn to protect themselves, and not ask the House to protect them against their own members.

Mr. KELLY would vote against this Bill. He did not think it was a satisfactory measure, coming from the Government, taking into consideration the report of the Disqualification Committee. He had made an attempt to improve the law upon this subject; but the House had disagreed with the provisions of his Bill, perhaps justly so, as such a Bill should be brought in by the Government in power. He thought this Bill inadequate for the purpose intended by the Committee, and utterly unworthy of any Government to bring before them. There should be a comprehensive and carefully-considered measure introduced, that would give satisfaction to all parties. He hoped the Government would withdraw the Bill. If not withdrawn, the House should have further time given to it to amend the Bill, so as to make it operate as fairly as possible.

Mr. REID had expressed his view of this matter last night on the Bill of the honorable member for New Plymouth. He thought the present Bill did not meet the requirements of the case. This Bill certainly would disqualify some members. He understood that it was their object to take out of this House all discussion as to whether members were disqualified or not, and to leave to some other tribunal the determination of this matter. Difficulties would always arise in discussing the matter of disqualification. The honorable member for Port Chalmers had said that he was very anxious to have a Disqualification Act passed; but that honorable gentleman would find that this measure, if it became law, might be very uncomfortable and unpleasant to men who were not trying to evade the Act in any way. That would be the case no matter how they framed the Act. He considered that the proper solution of the matter was that merely Civil servants and contractors should be disqualified, leaving it to the House to maintain the purity of Parliament. There was a great deal of what he might call sentimentality about this matter. On the one hand it was said that Parliament felt more secure by having a Disqualification Act passed, while on the other hand honorable members said that it made no difference, as the Government could do what they thought fit. The House should guard carefully everything done in regard to appointments or contracts, and to prevent the appointment of members of this House. The House could retaliate on any Government that made any appointment of members of the House. Not only should the Government be displaced, but the office should be declared vacant. He was quite sure that this House would always guard its own privileges. If they were to deal with this matter at all, he would say that any Disqualification Act that went beyond excluding contractors and Civil servants would, in his opinion, defeat its own object. He expressed a similar opinion last year. He wished to draw attention to subsection 4 of the Act of last year, which, he believed, had been introduced after a great deal of delicate negotiation. That subsection excluded members of the Provincial Executives, who held office at the date of the abolition of the provinces, from the operation of the Disqualification Act. If they were to have a Disqualification Act, every member of the House should stand on the same footing. He did not see why provincial officers should be allowed to come under the exemptions of the Act. Members of the Provincial Executives might now be appointed to any office in the State without the provisions of the Disqualification Act being infringed. If they were to have a Disqualification Act at all, it should apply equally. He would vote against the second reading of this Bill, and if it should go into Committee he hoped the Government would endeavour to have the 4th subsection of the Act of last year repealed. Again, he would ask why it was that a company of seven members were to be exempt. That might be a most dangerous provision in any Disqualification Act. Let them fancy a company with ten or twelve members of the House in it: would not that be a far more formidable company to deal with than one in which there was only one member of the House? He did not apprehend the danger which some honorable members expressed. The danger was very much magnified. But, if such a danger did exist, it would occur to a greater degree in the case of companies formed in which there might be several members of the House who would be able to bring pressure to bear on one or two other members, and who might have jobs smoothed over and concessions made. He hoped the Government would consider this matter very carefully. He would like to see a Disqualification Act passed on the basis indicated by the Bill of the honorable member for New Plymouth—namely, that contractors and Civil servants only should be disqualified, and the duty left to Parliament itself of preserving its own purity. He had not the least hesitation in saying that the people of New Zealand would always see that members did nothing unbecoming the honor and dignity of Parliament.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said this Amendment Bill was specially intended to exclude contractors. The honorable member for the Taieri said he would wish to have a Bill passed through Parliament excluding contractors and Civil servants. He would like the honorable member to point out how contractors were to be excluded. Would he exclude every person who was a shareholder in an insurance company or in any joint-stock company? If they were excluded, he (Mr. Montgomery) did not see how they could have a Parliament constituted at all. In every Road Board and every Municipality there was provision made that contractors should not have seats at the Board. He did not see why members of this House should arrogate to themselves that great purity, when they would not trust those who took contracts to sit as members of a Municipality. The honorable member for Marsden evidently thought that members of Municipalities or Road Boards must be a class of people that they could not possibly have in the Legislature of the country. The argument was quite inconsistent with the views the honorable member for the Taieri had often expressed. He had heard the honorable gentleman repeatedly say that he wished to have a Bill that would exclude contractors; but he never indicated how such a Bill could be framed: he never shadowed forth an idea in that direction. He (Mr. Montgomery) quite concurred that the Supreme Court was the best tribunal to decide all cases of alleged disqualification. He was sure that it was a tribunal that the country would depend more upon than the Legislature, because party feeling unquestionably entered very strongly into the matter, and influenced the opinions of honorable members no doubt unconsciously to themselves. Therefore he would like to see these questions of privilege relegated to the Supreme Court for decision; and if honorable gentlemen, instead of opposing a Disqualification Act, would endeavour to improve it, and make it one which would meet the necessities of the case, it would be much better. It was not a question of preserving the purity of Parliament so much as it was a question of preventing it from becoming impure. He thought the Bill, so far as it went, met the case of contractors, but he agreed that subsection 4 of the Act at present in operation should be struck out. The fact was, that Act had come down from the other branch of the Legislature at the close of the session, and this House accepted it in its imperfect state rather than risk losing it. He would support any member who moved that the section should be struck out. He certainly thought it was the duty of the House to see in what respect the present Disqualification Act could be improved; and he trusted that the House would not allow contractors of all kinds to sit in the Assembly, for if that were permitted great injustice would be done to the people. With respect to the other question, whether members of Parliament should be allowed to accept positions in the Civil Service as soon as the session had closed, it had been pointed out that it was not the number of offices which might be vacant, but the number of people who would be continually expecting office, that would do the mischief. He recollected that last year a Minister of the Crown related that, for an office the salary of which was £400 a year, twelve members were each expecting to be the fortunate one at the end of the session. Thus it would be seen that there was more damage from the expectations of members than from the number of offices which could be given away. Notwithstanding all that had been said by members previously, he could not forget that in former Parliaments members had not scrupled at expecting good fat billets at the end of a session. He did not say that any member of this Parliament aimed at anything of the sort, but it might be done; and it lowered the character of Parliament if the constituencies were to be led to believe that members did not seek to be returned for the purpose of legislating for the good of the country so much as for the purpose of getting billets for themselves. He trusted the Government would see its way clear to consider what improvements might be made in the Act.

Mr. KENNEDY said the Bill before the House did not in any way affect himself, at the present time at all events. It was quite true that the Committee which had been appointed to investigate the accusation against himself came to the conclusion that he was a contractor. He had no desire whatever to disagree with the report, but he should like to be allowed a few moments in which he would place before the House the real circumstances of the case. Being in Wellington during the recess, he saw an advertisement, which appeared in the papers, inviting tenders for the supply of coal to the Government buildings. He was largely connected with coal business in Greymouth. There were several other shareholders in the company to which he belonged, which was registered; but some of the shareholders had receded from the company, and that had suggested to his mind—

Mr. SPEAKER said the House was at all times willing to give a member every latitude if he wished to make a personal explanation, but he could not, at the present time, see that the honorable member was addressing himself to the Bill before the House. The Bill was of a general character, and had no particular reference to the matter alluded to by Mr. Kennedy, which had already been disposed of.

Mr. KENNEDY hoped the House would indulge him while he made a statement in this matter, because it affected him personally. He was about to say that he had sent in a tender in answer to the advertisement, but it was in the name of a friend, who had given his authority in that behalf, and who, moreover, was desirous of entering into the coal trade in one or other of the ports of New Zealand. His (Mr. Kennedy's) name did not appear in the tender at all, and he had no idea that by acting as he did he was in any way connecting himself with the Government. He proceeded to Dunedin, and a few weeks later learned that the tender was accepted. When the time came to furnish the supplies, he found that the person in whose name he had tendered was not fit to carry on the contract, and it became his duty to see that the contract was carried out. It was to that extent only that he had been connected with the contract in question, and he thought the circumstances would show that that contract had in no way influenced him in his action towards the Government in the House, or prejudiced his representation of his constituents. He was not now justifying, nor did he desire to justify, the action of any person in the House who was a contractor. He was opposed to it himself just as much as any other member of the House; but it was his extreme anxiety to see our coal introduced into more general use in New Zealand that had induced him to act as he did. The whole amount of the contract was very trifling. It was but a matter of three or four hundred tons, and the company could sell twice that amount in Greymouth every month, if it thought fit, at a much greater advantage than that given them by the Government. He thought it would be seen, by a return which he proposed to ask for, that the Government had saved £200 or £300 by the transaction, instead of sustaining any loss. Under these circumstances he did not think it could be said that his action had been influenced in consequence of the contract. He was now, however, dis severed from the thing, and could not be considered in any respect as a contractor; and the Bill did not affect him. He apologized to the House for having troubled them, but he assured honorable members that he had had no intention whatever of infringing the law.

Sir G. GREY, in reply, said that he had understood from the remarks of several honorable members, as well as from the report of the Disqualification Committee, that an oversight had occurred last year, by which the intentions of Parliament were defeated; and that, in order that the intention of that Act might be carried out, it was absolutely necessary that the words contained in the Bill should be inserted in the 7th section of the Act. The Bill had been introduced to meet the wishes of the Committee and the opinions expressed by several honorable gentlemen, and to render operative the intentions of Parliament. He could not agree with the contention of the honorable member for Waikato, who did not think that the Bill should be introduced this session, because it was retrospective.

Mr. WHITAKER had not contended that the Bill should not have been introduced this session, but that it was improper to make it retrospective.

Sir G. GREY said the Bill could not be otherwise than retrospective, seeing that it must affect gentlemen now sitting in the Assembly; and, if it should not be introduced this session, then it ought to be postponed until the next Parliament—that was to say, that contractors now sitting in Parliament must continue to sit until the end of the Parliament, some two and a half years hence. Then the honorable member for Port Chalmers objected to the Bill having been introduced in so simple a form: he seemed to consider that it should have been a larger and more extensive Bill. But the honorable gentleman had himself answered his own argument. He admitted that he had spent several sessions in endeavouring to devise a good Act, but had failed: then, how could he expect a Government which had only been in office a month to introduce a satisfactory Bill on the subject? The sole object of the Government in introducing the Bill was to prevent contractors sitting in the House during the continuance of the present Parliament, and to give effect in that respect to the recommendations of the Committee and the intention of Parliament. Having said that, he left the matter entirely to the consideration of the House. He had no particular desire to press the Bill forward. In the course of the discussion, honorable members had referred to the present state of the law in regard to petitions relating to the return of members to Parliament—what were called election petitions.

Allusion had also been made to one or two other points, which showed that the whole system required review. He was able to inform the House that a Bill was now in course of preparation by which the whole of the electoral system of the colony would be brought into conformity with what he might call the opinions of the present day. That Bill would be introduced next session: in fact, if the present session continued for a month longer, he would introduce it before Parliament was prorogued. The object of that measure was to simplify the mode of conducting elections, and to provide that election petitions should not be tried by the House, but by an impartial tribunal; for he felt bound to admit that it was almost impossible to hope that honorable members could proceed to consider such questions with unbiassed minds. The measure would also deal with the question of the franchise, and with the subject of disqualification; and care would be taken in it to provide that whatever laws might be passed by Parliament on the subject should be interpreted by a perfectly impartial and unbiassed tribunal. If honorable members were satisfied with the knowledge that such a Bill was in preparation and would be brought forward early next session, and thought that it was difficult to deal only partially with the subject this session, he would not press for the passing of the Bill now before the House, but would take the decision on the voices. He only stated these things to show that the Government had not been idle during the time they had been in office, and also that they did not desire to press on the present measure if the House did not wish it. It would be in the recollection of honorable members that several questions were put to the Government as to whether they intended to bring forward a Disqualification Bill this session, and it was in response to those questions, and the wishes expressed by several honorable gentlemen, that the measure had been introduced. Having said so much, he would leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. REES explained that he was one of the honorable members who asked the Premier to introduce this Bill. He had since asked the honorable gentleman to state that fact to the House, as he did not wish, by any apparent inconsistency on his own part or on the part of any other honorable member, that the honorable gentleman should be placed in a false position. Having been one of those who asked that the Bill should be introduced, he begged now to state that under the circumstances he did not think it would be necessary to pass it this session.

NATIVE AFFAIRS.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—The Native Lands Bill, the Order of the day for the second reading of which has just been called on, is not in print. The Bill itself is one of a purely technical character, and has no relation to the statement which I am now about to address to the House. I will preface my statement by moving the postponement of that Order until next Monday, so as to enable the Bill to be placed before the House in print.

Sir G. Grey

In proceeding to make my statement, I have to apologize to the House for the delay which has taken place, and which has been owing to the fact that for some time past I have been suffering from a malady which has to a great extent prevented me from speaking in the House, and which makes the task at the present time more a source of pain than of pleasure. But possibly I have not suffered by the delay, because I have been enabled to make further inquiries into matters connected with my department, which will make my statement of a fuller and more exhaustive kind than it otherwise would have been. At the same time, suffering as I am, I shall be glad if the House will give me a quiet hearing, as it is impossible that I can maintain my voice at an unusual pitch for any length of time. I will first, with the indulgence of the House, dispose of a matter which is of a somewhat personal character. No person, probably, had less idea than myself, when I left this House last year, that I should come back this session to hold the office of Native Minister. Some men, Sir, are born to greatness; others have greatness thrust upon them. I presume I am in the latter category.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Some achieve greatness.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—If I have achieved it, I may say this much, that I have achieved it by an earnest desire to do my best for the good of this country. For the last three or four years the newspapers have been teeming with remarks personal to myself, and especially upon the question of my connection with Native affairs—all pointing in the direction that I should be unfit to be intrusted with the management of them, and that necessarily I must be a person from whom good government could not possibly be expected. In this House, only a few nights ago, one of the oldest members took occasion to refer to myself in terms which I shall now read. I do not intend to debate those terms, and, although I may possibly be somewhat out of order in referring to them, as they were used in a previous debate, yet I hope the House will allow me to do so, because I was at that time unable to take part in the debate myself. The honorable member for Wanganui said,—

“Then I know my constituents will be delighted to hear the utterances of the Minister for Native Affairs. They would like very much to know by what means he is going to counteract that system of repudiation which he has been inaugurating in a certain province of New Zealand for some years past, and the leading delegates of which have been, within the last few months, on a visit to the district which I represent, for the purpose of inciting our Natives there also to engage in the work of repudiation, on the ground that the lands on which we are now living, and which were purchased, at the time when the honorable member for the Thames was Governor of the colony, at the price of 10d. and 1s. an acre, are now worth £10 an acre. I am sure that my constituents would be delighted to hear the honorable gentleman declare in this House the plan by which he means to counteract the mischievous, dangerous, ruinous, and fatal influences which that Repudiation party have been attempting to exercise within the last few months, by their leading chiefs and others, in the district which I have the honor to represent. I shall be glad to hear it myself, if I am to remain in the district and to hold my property there on this dangerous tenure which the Repudiation party is gradually spreading over the colony. I have no doubt that the Native Minister, with his great readiness at expedients, with his great ability, and with that large knowledge of the Natives which we have heard paraded by his chief, would be quite prepared to announce a policy which would relieve us from the dangerous position in which we stand. It would be satisfactory for us to know what it is."

Sir, I am about to expound that policy; but, before doing so, I trust I may be allowed to refer to this statement, inasmuch as it affects myself and my position in this House. I may say that, in the first place, the statement that emissaries of what is termed the Repudiation party have been in the honorable gentleman's district within the last few months is incorrect. To my certain knowledge no persons connected with the so-called Repudiation party have been there for the last two or three years. In the second place, I would point out that my connection with what is termed the Repudiation party is the ordinary connection which exists between a solicitor and his client. I simply undertook professional work—professional work which had been undertaken by other persons in the profession before myself, and professional work of a character which is being done now all over the North Island by members of the profession to which I belong. My own conscience is to myself the best answer as to how I have done that work. But I know this much: If I had chosen to make use of my position, I could have quadrupled, yea, could have increased my income ten or twelve times; but I have allowed public reasons to influence me too much in my connection with the work, and I have preferred to raise questions simply from a public point of view, rather than make the ordinary profit and gain which would have followed from the practice of my profession in the ordinary way. It is no crime in any one to take up the cause of the Natives, for they are British subjects, bound by our laws and compelled to obey them. Why should they be debarred from professional assistance, when the European, who knows the law and can speak the English language, can have legal assistance whenever he wants it? I feel sure that honorable gentlemen on both sides of the House will not look upon me as any the worse for having given honest, fair, and, as far as was in my power, able assistance to the Native people; and that, so long as I have not lent myself to any improper practices, or subjected myself to be struck off the rolls, they will not think the worse of me for having, as I have said, consented to become the advocate of a number of Native claims. I may say this much, and I say it advisedly: that, if it had not been for the fact that I took up these cases at the time I did, and that I stood by these people, refusing all offers of greater emolument—I say, but for that fact, you would have had in the District of Hawke's Bay disturbances of the most serious character. But the fact of my being there to lead them to look to the proper authority for redress, to furnish them with a vent to their grievances, was the means of preserving the peace. The cardinal principle which actuated me when I went to reside at Hawke's Bay, and which actuates me at the present time, is this: that I have always refused, and do now refuse, to undertake a single case as against the Government. I have advised the completion of Government purchases, and before I came down to this House I gave days of my time for the purpose of assisting in the completion of those Government purchases. It is quite true that I advocated the interests of the Natives of Hawke's Bay; it is quite true that I brought their cases into Court; but I have done no more for the Maori people than would be done for the European people by any member of the legal profession. But, holding the position which I now hold, I have ceased to advocate their cases. I have now to decide, and, if I have proved myself a straightforward advocate, that is a very good reason why I should prove a fair and impartial judge. Now, as the House is aware, a great many accusations have been made against me, and I find in this morning's paper a summary of those accusations. I am charged with preaching the "Gospel of Repudiation," and it is said that my accession to office is likely to lead to an agitation among the Native people. As a matter of fact, I have never gone outside of the small District of Hawke's Bay to conduct a case. I have been asked to take up cases in the Wairarapa, in Wanganui, and other parts of the country; but I have refused to do so, because I would on no account lend myself to an agitation which might assume a political character. I wish now to refer specifically to one matter. I have been charged since this House met with having advised Takarangi and other Natives residing near Wanganui to come down and demand possession of land which they asserted had been improperly taken from them by the Government. There are Europeans in this city and Native members in this House who were present at the interviews I had with Takarangi, and they can testify that, after hearing his case, I distinctly told him that he had no grounds, either in law or in equity, on which to go against the Government; that his only hope was to petition the House, and that the House might possibly recommend that he should receive a small grant of land. These gentlemen can bear me out in that. And I say this, further: that, the moment I heard what had occurred at Wanganui, I warned Takarangi to desist in his action, and that, if he did not, I and the gentlemen I have referred to would cease to take any interest in his petition. That disposes of that matter. I say emphatically that every accusation that I advised, aided, or abetted Takarangi in his action is absolutely untrue. It has also been said that the stealing of certain cattle at Punui, in the Waikato, and the driving them over the frontier into the King country, is also evidence of the encouragement given to the Natives by my accession to office. It happens, unfortunately for that statement, that no cattle were stolen at all. As a matter of fact, the lawless act complained of on the part of the King Natives was this: The cattle of a European settler strayed away in the night; they got into the King country, and were ordered to be driven back to the farm of the owner. I have received from Major Mair, Major Te Wheoro, and other Government officers, statements of the most distinct kind on that point. There has been no stealing: on the contrary, there has been additional proof of the desire of the Natives to conform to the law and to make friends of the Europeans. It has also been said that my accession to office has to some extent been the cause of the stoppage of the surveys at Taupo and other places. It is quite true that there have been stoppages of surveys, and I shall presently refer to the causes which led to those stoppages; but I will shortly state what has been the actual cause of the stoppages at the present time. It is well known that extensive purchases of Native land have been going on for two or three years past, and it is also well known that certain reserves were to be made out of those lands for the Natives. Although there were Government officers whose duty it was to make those reserves, they have not made them; and now the Native people have interfered, believing that the reserves were about to be denied them, and refuse to acknowledge the deeds of sale. So far as I can make out, those are the principal acts of lawlessness charged against myself and my colleagues. If we wished to adopt the tu quoque style of argument, we might point to many similar acts which have occurred during many years back—the murders of Sullivan and Todd, and the occurrence that took place a few days ago at Opunake—but they would not establish similar accusations against the late Government any more than the occurrences I have referred to establish the accusations against ourselves. But I will state presently how I can quite imagine that these things may happen, and I will show that it would be wise and prudent not to attempt to enforce the law at the risk of imperilling the peace of the country. I must say that I felt grieved at the tone of the remarks of the honorable member for Wanganui, because I have a vivid recollection of the manner in which the honorable gentleman himself formerly advocated the interests of the Native people. There was a time when there was no Repudiation party, but there were charges of gross injustice to the Native people. The honorable gentleman warmly advocated their cause, and he and his party tried to place themselves in power on the strength of their advocacy. Having used that ladder, he has thrown it down, but he ought not to charge me with anything discreditable because I honestly make use of the same means to gain position. Up to the present time I have been about the best-abused man in the country, with the exception of the Premier; but I have never replied to any attacks made on me personally. These attacks have, however, acquired a significance they did not possess before, because it is believed, rightly or wrongly, that they are inspired by gentlemen who were lately relieved from office, although they are written by gentlemen not members of this House. The paper in which these charges appear is the morning paper published in Wellington, and if it has a leaning it is certainly on the side of the present Opposition. Now, Sir, looking at the fact that for the last five or six years the administration of Native affairs has been in the hands of one person, and that we have only had what I may call progress reports at the various meetings of the Assembly, I may perhaps be excused if I go into matters more fully than they have been gone into for some time past. I shall go very fully into the Native question. I shall give facts and figures, and leave the House to draw its own deductions from those facts and figures. To do so may occupy some time, and it may be a little wearisome; but at the same time, having these facts and figures before them, honorable members will be better able to master the position, and will be better able to judge of our prospects than they would be without them. As honorable members are aware, we have tried various methods of treating the Native people. We have tried to be lenient and kind to them; and that policy, with the exception of the outbreak at the Bay of Islands in 1845, and the outbreak on the coasts of Cook Strait about that time, has been followed out ever since. Up to 1863 we had almost unbroken peace throughout the country. A policy prevailed which was termed the "flour-and-sugar policy," a name which was indicative of the contempt in which the policy was held by the people of the colony; but I shall show that it was a policy which, with its many drawbacks, was productive of many benefits. In 1863 we entered on our real contest and struggle with the Native people in the Waikato war. We borrowed a large sum of money for that purpose. I say, for myself, and I say it now for the great bulk of the people of the colony, that, if we could go back to that time, and reconsider our position, we should never have had a Waikato war. The £3,000,000 which was borrowed to carry on that war could have been better employed than in decimating the Native people, and it would have been possible to avoid a conflict with the Native race. From 1863 to 1869 we had nothing but a succession of chronic wars. The Waikato war was hardly over before we had a war at Wanganui, and another on the East Coast. From 1836 to 1869 there was nothing but disturbance; but from 1869 we have had peace, almost unbroken peace, a peace which has only been disturbed by some isolated act of aggression or some solitary murder in the out-districts. It should be remembered, in justice to men who bore the heat and burden of that day, that it is not to the Public Works policy that is due the peace which has followed. There is no doubt that the men who adhered to the policy pursued from 1863 to 1869, which they did in spite of the greatest reverses and in spite of public opinion, accomplished the work of breaking the power of the Native people in this Island, and that but for what they accomplished the Public Works policy could not have been carried out, nor should we have had the peace which we have since enjoyed. In saying that, I am by no means disposed to overlook the beneficial results of the Immigration and Public Works policy upon this Island. And here I would say, sinking all party feeling, forgetting all past differences, that it would be unfair to deny that to Sir Donald McLean we are largely indebted for the fact that from 1869 up to the present time we have been at peace with the Native people. Whatever may have been our differences with him, politically or privately, there can be no doubt that to him and to his policy, and to his determination to avoid a conflict with the Native people, we are indebted for the fact that we have not been called upon to encounter the Natives and to borrow money to carry on a war. It has been said that during these five or six years the old policy has been restored, that the law has not been vindicated, and that the Natives have been allowed to do as they thought proper; but I hold that on entering upon the Immigration and Public Works policy it would have been an act of suicide to have provoked or sought for a Native disturbance. The essence of our being able to borrow money in the English market was the fact that the colony was at peace. Had disturbances occurred about that time, we might have packed up our traps and left districts, which are now flourishing and prosperous, in possession of the Natives. And when we are reminded of these things—an outrage here and a murder there—I prefer to look at the general results, rather than to say that the perpetrators of these outrages should forthwith be punished, or that reparation at all hazards should be enforced. I look at the general results, and say that the colony must progress—that it is better to allow these acts to pass for a time unpunished on account of the greater good which is being performed for the colony. Now I come to a question which has been raised on several occasions by the public Press—namely, the possibility of another Native outbreak. In the first place, I will mention to the House what is at the present time the precise number of the Native population. The last census, taken in 1874, gave us the following return: For the North Island—males, 23,649; females, 19,769: or a total of 43,418. The population of the South Island is about 3,600, making a gross total of about 46,000. We must also remember how that population is distributed. A large portion of it is to the north of Auckland, another large portion is located between Auckland and the Waikato, another large portion is situated on the East Coast, and yet another large portion is located in Hawke's Bay. I say that in all these districts the chances of a Native outbreak are absolutely infinitesimal. The Natives of those districts themselves would, whenever called upon, do as they have done before—assist us to put down any Native outbreak. If there be any part of the Native population in the North Island who we may expect would be the prime movers in a Native outbreak it is those who live in the King country. The King country contains only 5,255 persons, and of these but 2,856 are males. Of course we must not forget that when a crisis comes a number of Native women can take up arms, and use them with considerable effect; but, looking at the fact that we have 25,000 or 30,000 loyal Natives on our side, the chances of a Native outbreak are simply nil. Now, I will point out, and I point it out with regret, that, while we are increasing in population, the Natives, from whom it is thought we are in this danger, are decreasing. There has been a system instituted by which we are enabled to ascertain the number of births and deaths which occur in the different Native districts, and I find that the births are not as large in proportion to the number of Natives as they used to be. In the District of Tauranga the numbers of the Native population are as follow:—

Decrease ... .. 97

This decrease is owing to the dying out of the race. Apart from the fact that the chance of a Native outbreak is something below zero, all the evidence points in the direction that we need not any further dread a Native war. We know that the Natives themselves wish to be reconciled to their European friends, and that they are desirous of becoming amenable to the law. They are settling down into steady habits, and the King Natives have invited to live amongst them a large number of the most loyal Natives in the colony—I mean the people of whom Te Wheoro is a leading chief. There is another reason why I think we may dismiss from our minds the idea that there is any possibility of a Native outbreak, and that is that the King country is split into two parts. On the one side we have the King and his party, and on the other side we have Rewi and his party; and I do not think they would unite again to wage war with the Europeans. It is just as well that we should know this, because there is nothing that could do more harm to the colony than to have the impression go abroad that there was any danger of another Native war. We must remember that our Public Works policy is unfinished, and, if that policy is to be made the success which its promoters intended it to be, it will be necessary to show to the money-lender in England that the borrowed money will not have to be spent in putting down Native outbreaks, but in carrying on the public works which have already been undertaken. I look upon the money which has already been spent in putting down Native outbreaks in the light of money thrown away. I observe, from certain statements which I have in my office, that we expended something like £3,200,000 in putting down Native disturbances, and, as I have already said, I consider that that money was simply thrown away. I feel perfectly certain that, if we continue our present policy, and if, instead of firing powder and ball at the Natives, we spend the money in opening up the country, the result will be infinitely more beneficial to the colony. A great deal of good has resulted from the spending of the money which has already been expended in the Native districts in opening up roads, &c. The amount spent in that way up to the present time is about £450,000; and, if we continue to spend money in the same manner and on the same object, it will produce at least this good: that in the event of a war the whole country will in the course of time be traversable from end to end. I shall now refer very briefly to the question of the administration of justice in the Native districts. In those districts justice is administered by gentlemen of the European race. They act as Magistrates, and are assisted by assessors and policemen without number. I remember that when, in 1873, I was travelling overland from Napier to Auckland, I stopped for a short time in the Arawa country, and I found that nearly every male adult in the place was either an assessor, an assessor's clerk, a policeman, or a policeman's clerk; and I found that the amount spent among those people every year in salaries and allowances was nearly £9,000. Although that system is not now carried on to such a great degree, still it is going on to some extent, and I believe that some reform is needed in that direction. We have been for some time past in the habit of making some slight medical provision for the Native people, and I may say that I propose to continue to do so, and, if possible, upon a somewhat more extensive scale, until the Natives can provide for themselves in that respect. We expend money in this direction for the Europeans, and I do not see why we should not do it also for the Maoris, who are, like us, inhabitants of the colony, and contributors to the revenue. I shall not refer to this matter at any greater length, because I have subjects of greater importance yet to deal with. I will now refer to the subjects of Native schools and Native education. Everybody who knows anything of the Native character will admit that the Maoris have a wonderful aptitude for learning. In the early days, even before the establishment of the colony, the Natives were taught by the missionaries to read, write, and calculate. They learnt to do all these things in a very short space of time, and as each became proficient he went out to teach his friends. This was the case in 1840, and for some years afterwards there were more Natives in the colony who could read, write, and calculate than there were Europeans. But the defect was that they were taught to read, write, and work sums in the Native language, and consequently they were as far from having a knowledge of the English language as they were before. Sir, I am again called upon to speak in praise of the gentleman, now deceased, who for several years held the office of Native Minister. The Natives are now, and have been for some years past, taught in the English language, and it was largely owing to his exertions that that system was introduced, and the system had only been prevented from becoming a greater success by the fact that the country had not sufficient funds to expend in carrying it out. I have received from the various Native schools the results of the last examination; I have received specimens of their writing from dictation, drawing, arithmetic, needlework, &c.; and I can only say that they would be a credit to the pupils of any school in this or any of the other colonies. I hope, before the House rises, to obtain a room in these buildings in which to exhibit them, so that honorable members may judge for themselves as to the progress that the children are making. The total amount spent on the education of the Natives during the past seven years has been only £80,000, and this year we propose to spend £11,000, or £4,000 less than last year. With that money we propose to maintain fifty village schools. I think we shall be justified in asking that this vote be increased, and I feel certain that the amount spent in educating the Natives is money well spent. I am sure that it will repay us a hundred-fold. What we want is more schools, and we want, also, the best masters we can get. The schoolmasters must be well paid. Their work is very arduous, and they have to put up with all sorts of hardships, and the man who would undertake to do the work for small pay is not the man who will be up to the standard that is required. One of the great defects, so far, has been that the masters have not been paid well enough. I think, therefore, that we ought to give them higher salaries. I will now refer to one more branch of what I may term the social question, which will occupy the attention of the Government in their dealings with the Native people, and that is, in reference to assisting to put down the spread of intemperance among them. If it be desirable to educate the Native people—if it be desirable to make an attempt to raise them to our own level, looking at the fact that they are a semi-savage race, having all the defects and desires of a semi-savage people, fond of excitement, and especially of the excitement that springs from intoxicating drink, we should endeavour, as far as we possibly can, even if we do nothing more, to aid them in the efforts which they are now making for themselves in this direction. I admit that the law on this matter as it now stands is in an unsatisfactory condition: indeed, the Sale of Spirits Ordinance has been for many years a dead-letter, and any attempt to enforce a law which has been practically in abeyance for the last twenty years would be an injustice rather than a benefit. As I mentioned on a previous occasion when the House was discussing this question, we can do this much: We can help the Native people to regulate their own settlements so as to prevent the introduction or use of ardent spirits within those settlements. I have no fear of what the effect will be. I have no fear but that the Native people will shake off the habits of intemperance in which they have indulged. I think I shall have the support of the House in the efforts I shall make to enable steps of this kind to be taken in Native districts. I am glad to be able to say that the reports from all parts of the country for the present year show a decrease in the drinking habits of the Native people. The cause of this is not difficult to see. There are two causes at work in this direction. First of all, there is the falling off to some extent of Government land purchases, consequently there is not the same amount of money to spend as formerly, and therefore there is a less quantity of liquor consumed. There is, however, a much more valuable cause at work, and one which this House will sympathize with—the movement which is known as the Good Templar movement. That movement has taken a strong hold on the Native people, and Lodges have been formed in different parts of the country. Any person holding the office which I do should do everything in his power to assist in developing that movement and encouraging the people who are taking these steps to establish Good Templar Lodges among the Native people. Sir, I now come to a very practical question indeed—the question of our Native land purchase system. I am speaking now of our Native land purchase system such as it has been made since the introduction of the Immigration and Public Works policy. The House will remember that from 1870 up to the present time we have authorized the raising of £700,000 by way of loan for the purchase of a landed estate in the North Island. Of that amount the greater portion has been spent. It has been spent in such a way as, to my mind, to produce the least possible result with the largest amount of money. The cardinal defect in the system has been that the purchase of Native land has been conducted on commission. The persons purchasing have looked rather to the quantity than to the quality of the land bought. Their object was to try to close transactions in order to get the commission on the purchase. I can show that in many cases the transactions have not been closed at all. I would point out something that has happened in connection with these purchases which has made apparent to my mind the defect of the system of payment by commission. The Land Purchase Commissioners negotiated for the purchase of large blocks of land in every direction, and small payments were made on account. It has also happened in many cases that, instead of going to the elders of the tribes who held the land, to men of mature age and possessing greater wisdom, who could make a prudent bargain, the agents have gone to the young and improvident people of the tribes, and have induced them to accept small payments on account when large sums ought to have been obtained. Again, the money has been paid in what I may term dribblets, and in many cases payment has not been made in cash: it has been made in orders to storekeepers, and the bulk of it has been spent in absolutely unnecessary articles of luxury—the greater portion, I have good ground to fear, on grog. In addition to this defect in the system, we have had the delays in the completion of the purchase. Some of the transactions are two or three years old at the present time, and appear to be no nearer completion than at the commencement. We have an additional element of trouble and disturbance from the fact that in many of these cases no reserves were made, although promised. In some instances the land was taken in lumps, without any reserves of any kind being left, and we have now to take the power of making these reserves. Sir, all these things combined to produce a feeling among the Native people which is fatal to the successful operations of the Government in a Land Purchasing Department. I will show the House some of the results of the system, and I think honorable members will agree with me that I have put the thing mildly—that I have not at all exaggerated the state of the case in saying that we have got the least possible result for the largest amount of money. The official return of land negotiated for is as follows: Freehold, 4,613,000 acres (I give the round numbers only); leasehold, 1,540,000 acres—making a total area of a little over six million acres. That in itself looks very promising indeed, but when we go below the surface and see the absolute result the House will find that I am justified in condemning the system as I have done. I find that of the freehold transactions only 1,967,402 acres have been completed, leaving nearly 2,700,000 still unsettled. I have been informed by the officers of the department that out of the leasehold transactions they cannot return one single acre in a state to hand over to any single European purchaser. They cannot give me an instance of a single lease of land that the Government might to-morrow cut up into allotments and dispose of to private persons. Of the £700,000 raised by loan, a sum of £531,048 has been expended, only leaving to complete two-thirds of the actual work not much more than one-fifth of the money. I have made inquiries on the question of payment of rent. We have got nothing as yet, and, until we get something, as a prudent Government we will not pay any rent at all. I may mention that in the items of expenditure there is a total of £102,000 incidental expenses. I have heard honorable gentlemen refer to that as indicating an enormous percentage on the cost of purchase, but on looking into the items it will be found that this is not so, for, out of the £102,000 payable, £17,000 has to be paid to the Province of Auckland in settlement of old land claims, £3,000 has to be paid to the Province of Hawke's Bay in settlement of similar claims, and about £36,000 has to be transferred to the Native Land Court to meet expenses in connection with the acquisition of Native land. The total expense for surveys and the acquisition of land has been £40,000 or £44,000. The defects in the leases, so far as I can make out, are of three kinds. In the first place, there are some instances in which the proper persons did not give their sanction. In the second place, there are persons, being married women whose names appear in the Crown grant, whose husbands were not consenting parties. And, in the third place, persons are named in the Crown grants as consenting parties who were under age. Those causes will also be found to be at work even in regard to the freehold land. Of the 1,967,000 odd acres of freehold land negotiated for, at least in regard to one-third of it it will be found that the titles are invalid, and it will require more money to be paid away and other acts to be done in order to make those titles good. It must be evident to the House, from what I have said, that, in order to carry out to completion all these land transactions and negotiations, it will be requisite for the House to furnish more money. We have only a balance standing at present amounting to £168,000, and therefore more money will have to be got to complete the bargains that are now outstanding. Now, I have to invite the House to the conclusion to which I have come upon this matter. In the first place, it is necessary, in order to save us from a great loss, that these titles should be made good, and that we should get consideration as far as possible for the money which we have paid. In some instances we shall not be able to complete the whole title to a particular block. In that case we will hand back, to the persons who will not agree to sell, so much of the land as will represent their interests. It will be necessary to take power by legislation to complete the transfer of blocks in which minors are owning parties. There are a number of blocks of land in which children under age have interests, and to enable them to dispose of their title it will be necessary to take power to allow trustees to be appointed by the Governor in Council, under whose authority the sales may take place. The Bill deals with that and other matters, and by it the Governor in Council may appoint trustees with power to sell, and give them certain control as to how the purchase-money may be invested for the benefit of the minors. It is proposed, also, to abolish the system of payment by commission, to close up at once all outstanding contracts of that nature, and to employ in the completion of purchases persons who will be really and truly Government officers, responsible to the Government for their actions. We intend to make it a cardinal principle, in regard to every one of these persons and every officer of the Native Department, that not one of them, from the chief downwards, shall attempt to acquire Native land for himself or others while he is employed as a Government officer. I know that many of our troubles in this matter have arisen from the fact that Government officers and others have been acquiring land for themselves or other private persons at the same time that they were acquiring land for the Crown. I say it is a safe and sound principle to lay down that, so long as a Government officer receives proper consideration for his services to the Government, he should be compelled to stand on one side and make no bargains for himself or for others. I now come to another question, and that is, whether or not we should carry on any regular system of land purchases on Government account. Upon that point I may say that I think it will give us as much as we shall be able to do to complete the negotiations now going on, and, that being done, we shall do well to come to a decision similar to that which was to have been come to by our predecessors: that the Government should go out of the market as a general purchaser of Native land. There are several reasons why it appears to me that it must be so. If we have to do anything, there is nothing like doing it with a good grace. In the first place, it means, if we are to carry on the present system on an extensive scale, that there must be large sums of money spent. In the second place, it becomes more and more difficult every month for the Government to acquire Native land, because the Native people can find private purchasers who will give two, three, and four times the price the Government will give, and it is not to be expected that the Natives will let the Government have their land for 2s. 6d. per acre when private persons are willing to give 10s. One more remark in reference to the purchase of Native lands, and then I have done with that part of the subject. The money voted by the House for the purchase of Native land was apportioned amongst the several provinces of the North Island. It was apportioned thus: The Province of Auckland received one-half the amount, and Wellington, Hawke's Bay, and Taranaki received the balance in smaller amounts computed in proportion to population. As it stands now, the department is advised that of that amount Auckland will require this year to expend £52,000; Taranaki, £10,000; Wellington, about £8,000; Hawke's Bay, about £7,000. The balances in the respective provincial districts stand as follow: Auckland, £30,894, deficiency about £18,000; Wellington, £69,000, surplus £48,095; Hawke's Bay, £40,000, surplus £32,601; Taranaki, £28,230, surplus £18,230. We purpose for the present year to operate upon these funds without distinction in regard to provincial distribution. That is to say, we shall take from the balance that is left so much as is required to complete the Auckland purchases, and next year we shall ask the House to consider the question of returning to the other provinces the amounts thus drawn from their accounts. I have now come to this point: that the Government propose to retire from the field as land purchasers on a large scale. They consider it is proper under existing circumstances to leave private persons to be the chief operators in the purchase of Native land. This, no doubt, is a very important question. I suppose, if there be one acre of Native land in the North Island there are fully 30,000,000 acres still untouched, and still open to be dealt in by persons desirous of purchasing and settling on land in this colony. In 1862 an Act was passed which, for the first time, abolished the right of pre-emption, established the Native Land Court, and enabled private persons to deal with the Native people for the purchase of their lands. I have never changed my opinion about that measure. The surrender of the right of pre-emption was the most fatal mistake that was ever made in this colony, and I am sure that had that mistake not been made we should not have seen one-half the trouble that we have experienced in the past. However, "it is no use crying over spilt milk:" the thing is done. The law has been in operation for a number of years, it is now a fixed part of the policy of the country, and it would be simply absurd to attempt to meddle with or change that policy. The Act of 1873, under which we now are, is admitted to be a failure, and to my mind its greatest defect consists in this fact: that the Native Land Court has become the servant of the Native Department. The Judges of that Court have ceased to possess any independence, and the Court itself has simply become a machine which has been used to help the Government to secure a large quantity of Native land in the North Island. However desirable it may have been to secure such an estate, however much the public interest may have been benefited by what has been done, I think it is a matter of regret, and also a matter of considerable danger, that the Government should be in a position to interfere with the administration of justice in the Native Land Court by altering the proceedings of that Court as they please, and preventing the Natives from securing that justice to which they are entitled. Last session the Government promised to deal with the question, and during the present session they introduced a Bill for that purpose. It was discussed, and, after a very severe fight indeed, it was withdrawn. As the work of a draftsman, that Bill was simply faultless; but its policy was very faulty. The sole object of the Bill we had placed before us was to construct what may be termed a novel kind of threshing machine, into which if you put the Native land of the colony in the shape of straw it would immediately come out, in the hands of the Europeans, as wheat. For that purpose the machine could not have been improved. Had it once got into operation the whole of the Native land in the colony might have been put through it in twelve months. However, it was felt by the House that there were two things necessary in a Native Lands Bill—that every facility should be given to Natives who had a right to land to obtain their Crown grants; and, secondly, that, in the interest of European settlement, it was necessary to prevent the acquisition of whole sides of country by single individuals. The feeling on all hands was so strong that the Bill did not contain these necessary conditions that the Government were obliged to withdraw the measure. But then they made a greater mistake than the first by bringing in a Bill to stop all transactions in Native land for a period of twelve months. While I am opposed to inordinate speculation by individuals, and while I believe that in the interests of the colony it is of importance—of large importance—to put a stop to it, still I say this: that I would much rather see settlement of that kind going on than see settlement entirely put a stop to; and it would have been doing a great injustice to Natives and Europeans alike to have put a stop to all Native land transactions for a period of twelve months. I shall now state what action we propose to take this session. We propose merely to touch the Native land question on one or two points—first, in respect to providing for the inclusion of minors in Crown grants in the direction in which I have already spoken; and, secondly, we propose to amend the machinery of the Native Land Court in one respect. At present, decisions of the Court may be appealed against without any cost to the appellant, and the fact that a man may have a rehearing at no cost to himself, coupled with a chance of getting a verdict in his favour, leads to many rehearsings which are altogether unnecessary. We therefore propose to alter the law, so that if a man wants a rehearing he must first guarantee the costs of an appeal. That is the extent to which we shall go in dealing with the question this session.

Mr. GISBORNE.—To whom are appeals to be made?

Mr. SHEEHAN.—To the Native Land Court; but the person to hear and decide the appeal must be a person not connected with the decision to be appealed against. Before referring to what we shall propose to do next year, I may say we shall use the present Native Lands Act for the purpose of preventing undue speculation. I shall presently explain to the House what we propose to be done. We take it that the very foundation of a proper Native Land Bill is to settle Native title, and to put the Natives in a position to hold land under Crown grants; and, in order to accomplish that effectually, we say that the facts as to ownership must be found by the men who are the best qualified to find those facts. At the present time those facts are found by a European Judge, and he settles the matter according to Native custom. But where does he get his information from? From the Native chiefs. They are the people from whom he gets his knowledge, and we propose that our Native Land Bill shall contain a provision whereby the independent and intelligent chiefs of the different tribes shall themselves find those facts, and that there shall be European Judges simply for legal purposes only—that their duty shall be not to ascertain title, but to inform the Natives of the operation of the European law of property, and settle the title according to the wish of the admitted owners. By that means I think we shall get over the difficulties which have troubled us in the past, and which are still troubling us, in regard to children and married women. If the Natives once learn how the European law operates they will see that the children in the Crown grants are represented by fit persons, and will take care that the husbands of married women shall be placed in the Crown grants. I am also strongly of opinion that the establishment of such a system will largely reduce the cost of maintaining the Native Land Court. We think that, if that system were adopted, two or three Judges to hold Courts in various parts of the country would be sufficient for all the purposes of the Act. I come now to the question of what may be termed illegitimate speculation; and speculation which may be termed illegitimate has not in the past been altogether an unmixed evil. It must be borne in mind that in some cases large areas of country may very properly be taken up, because, owing to differences in quality and capabilities in various parts of the country, we know that in some districts it would be almost impossible for men to settle profitably unless they take up large areas. In some cases large areas must be held; but what I object to is, that large blocks of land should be held by single individuals which might more profitably be cut up into small farms, and might support a large population instead of a large number of sheep. It appears to me that the safest way of getting over the difficulty is this: In the first place, to insert in any law passed by this House provisions which will give every facility for the individualization of Native title. If we were to pass such a law as that, we should at once cease hearing of large blocks of country, say, of 30,000, 40,000, or 50,000 acres, being put through the Court in the interest of ten or twelve people. If you give the means of speedily determining the rights of individuals in large blocks of land, you will at once put a stop to land monopoly by large capitalists. Therefore such a provision as that will be an essential feature of the Bill we propose to introduce next session. If possible, before Native land is dealt with, the owners will be asked to individualize their title, the delay, and difficulty, and obstruction which now exist in the accomplishment of that purpose having been removed. We shall rather go out of our way in bringing about the individualization. The effect of that would be, of course, to reduce the areas of the blocks, and I feel certain that, while, on the one hand, such a course will promote the settlement of the country by encouraging small capitalists, it will also do a great act of justice to the Native people who own these lands. I know, and many other members who come from Native districts must know, that there have been many cases in which blocks of land belonging to a whole tribe have been sold for the exclusive benefit of a few persons, while the persons who, under a different system from the present, would be in the Crown grant, and entitled to a full share of the benefit, have been told to go about their business. That I believe to be one of the greatest causes of discontent amongst the Natives against the Native Land Court. It appears to me, also, that we shall, as a Government, having ceased to be land-buyers, be able to act somewhat in the direction of advising and directing the Native people in regard to the disposal of their land. Having ourselves ceased to be purchasers, we shall be able to give independent and impartial advice, which must have a good effect upon the Native mind. While it might not be desirable to lay down an absolutely hard-and-fast rule compelling them to come to us for advice and assistance, yet, if we show them that we are anxious to really assist them, we shall very soon have applications from all parts of the country asking us to advise and assist them in selling their lands. I next come to the question of the settlement of the country in large areas. I myself, having had many opportunities of judging of the capabilities of most parts of the North Island, am well aware that there are many thousands of acres in that Island which could not be profitably owned except in large areas, and that to put a man down on four or five hundred acres of it would simply be cruelty of the grossest kind. Where the land, from its situation, quality, or other causes, cannot be profitably occupied in small areas, I think it will be best for the good of the country to promote the settlement of that land even though it be in large areas. I come now to the question of Native representation. This is a very vexed question. Since I have been a member of this House, we have had, every year except the present, Bills providing for increased representation of the Native race. Last year a promise was given by the late Government to bring down a Bill dealing with the subject this year, and, although I understood from the honorable member for the Waikato that he would not be able to fulfil that promise this session, still he gave the House, in a speech delivered in the early part of the session, some indication of what the Bill was likely to be. I gathered that he proposed to abolish the special representation, or rather that portion of the law which enables Natives to vote for Europeans and at the same time gives them a special representation by persons for whom they alone could vote. I do not look upon that as a solution of the question. If the Natives throughout the country held their land under Crown grant, and could register their votes as Europeans do, I should at once abolish the present special representation, and say to them, "If you wish to be represented and vote as Europeans do, you too must take those steps to enable you to do so which are provided for by the Constitution Act." But, as a matter of fact and of law, it is impossible for the great majority of the Natives to have such power of voting, and therefore it would, in my opinion, be a great injustice to deprive them altogether of the franchise by abolishing their special representation. There are at present two systems at work—special representation by Maori members elected by the Maoris themselves, and the system whereby, at the election of European members, a small percentage of Maori votes can be given for the European. I say unhesitatingly that the proportion of Maori votes given for Europeans is not more than 5 per cent. of the whole, although, as a matter of fact, the proportion of Maoris to Europeans is very much larger. The solution of the difficulty which I should propose, and which I believe would be fair, would be the retention of the special representation, increasing the number of members to seven, and leaving it at that for some years to come, when we may hope that, by the operation of a suitable Native land law, and by the conversion of the Native titles to a freehold tenure under Crown grant, we could call upon them to give up all special representation of the race, and to vote as Europeans do. I shall now make a few remarks with reference to the department over which I specially preside. Very few people have lived in this colony for any length of time without hearing a great deal of evil about this department. If anything is likely to catch the public ear at election time, and, if I may say so, bring down the house and secure an ovation for the orator, it is abuse of the Native Department. But the Native Department, like a great many other things, is not deserving of all the abuse it receives. For my own part, I utterly deny the theory that you can carry on the business of the country without something in the semblance of a Native Department. Until you have taught the Natives to speak English, given them a better knowledge of our laws and customs, and induced them to intermingle more with the European population, you must have some special source from which you can convey information to them and by means of which you can learn their wants. I should, however, be sorry to take upon myself the defence of the Native Department, or to constitute myself its apologist. I believe that, while it has existed for many years for a good purpose, it has worked in many cases for a bad purpose. It has stopped settlement, and there are not wanting good grounds for saying that difficulties have been thrown in the way of settlement in many instances by the Native Department. But I must speak of things as I find them, and I am bound to say that I can speak in the highest terms of the chief officers of the Native Department with whom I have been brought into contact during my short tenure of office. Speaking, first, of Mr. Clarke, the Under Secretary, I am glad that an impression which I entertained with regard to him has been totally removed, and I can now say that I know him to be a most indefatigable, fair, and impartial officer. I know, too, that the gentleman in whose hands rests the management of Native schools and of education amongst the Natives has proved himself to be a most enthusiastic and zealous advocate of improving their condition. It is not, however, against the central department that the public has most complaint to make. It is in regard to the ramifications of it throughout the country in the remoter districts that cases have arisen to lay it open to criticism. I make this statement not idly or without consideration, and I say we should lop off numbers of those branches, and by doing so we shall confer great good upon the public, and effect a great saving in the revenue. If it should be my lot to carry on this department until the next session of this House, I hope I shall be able to show that the Native Department, from being, as it is now, a very large, ill-organized department, will have been reduced to a useful skeleton department, concentrated here in Wellington. I do not believe in the cry that the Natives and Europeans should be treated as one people. We hear very often of their both being subjects of the Queen, and that they should be treated alike and placed under exactly the same laws. But any man of common sense and fair reasoning will admit that, though they are equally subjects of the Queen, yet the difference in point of intelligence is so great between them and the Europeans that you cannot apply to one the rules which you can apply to the other. You therefore require some special means of dealing with the Natives and governing them. At the same time, I think that the means employed are far too scattered and expensive, and that you can reduce the number of officers in many places, and thereby, instead of creating disturbances, you will be drawing the Native people closer and closer into the bonds of civilization with their European friends. I myself have often felt what it was to be thwarted by an official of this department. The objection to the department has been that the members of it dwelt, metaphorically speaking, in a cave into which you could not enter unless you had the pass-word "Open, sesame." But, once that pass-word was obtained, you could go in and buy Native lands or work Native oracles as you chose. If, on the other hand, you could not use the pass-word, or, in colonial phraseology, "tip the wink," you might go about your business. That is a system which should be put an end to, and I think that, by the reduction in the number of officers which we propose to make, it will largely come to an end. I will now refer to the question of our relations with the King. I have referred to it to some extent before, when speaking on the subject of whether we were likely to have a Native disturbance or not. I have shown, I think, that such a thing is not likely to occur. I now say that it is possible to settle the present King difficulty and remove that which has been the greatest barrier to settlement in the North Island. We have been told that the telegrams which we received from the King country have been manufactured by our agents there. I may say at once that we have no agents there except those officers of the Government whom we found when we came into office. For myself, I may say that I have not sent a single telegram to any person in the Waikato outside of the Government service, nor have I received any from that place, and I may say the same for all my colleagues. The telegrams we have received were sent unasked for, and we have the most positive assurances that the King himself is ready to meet us, in the expectation that the present difficulty and the barrier that separates him and his people from the Europeans and the rest of his own race may be removed. I may say that the communications we have received have not been from friendly Natives only, but we have received private telegrams from Manuhiri, the secretary to the King, and from the King himself, and I believe it is the first time that such a telegram has been received by the Native Department for the last five or six years. We are told that no good will result from such a meeting; and one reason given is, that my honorable friend the Premier was Governor of the colony when the Waikato war broke out, and that he partly consented to it. But the fact is that the Natives respect no man so much as the man whom they would call a toa—the man who has fought and beaten them. Instead of being an objection, that will be a recommendation to my honorable friend if he goes to the King country. No one can overestimate the value of the settlement of this difficulty. For some years past these Natives have remained quiet, doing nothing more than shelter some fugitive offender: still the existence of that country in its present state is a great stoppage to settlement, and, if it once went forth to the world that the difficulty was settled, and that the aukati no longer existed, you could go into the money market and borrow as much as you liked on reasonable terms. I do not for a moment pretend to say that we can, by going up there and by interviewing the King for a few hours, settle at once and for ever the King difficulty. It is possible we might fail even at a long interview; it might necessitate even further correspondence and negotiations. But I only claim this much for the Government: that we go there invited to go there; that we go there with a certain amount of good reputation in our favour; and that the people themselves are anxious to meet us, and are hopeful of a satisfactory settlement being come to. It may be that the demands made by them will be demands which we, regarding the interests of the colony, cannot afford to concede; and for my part I would be no party to a concession which would materially affect our interests, weaken the respect which we are entitled to in the eyes of the Native people, or render to the Natives residing in the King country more than they are entitled to as a matter of justice and fair-play. I shall be glad if the result of our interview will be a settlement of this King difficulty, and, if it be, I shall be still further glad if within no distant time we shall have present in this House as a member of it some leading chief either of the Waikato or the Ngatimaniapoto tribe. I think I have dwelt upon all the more salient points with regard to Native affairs in this Island, and I have taken up the time of the House at great length, for which they must excuse me. I have been very anxious to put our views on the subject before the House as completely as I could, so that in weighing and determining upon the policy of the new Government they might not come to a conclusion without being sufficiently informed. Sir, the time was when the Native question was the main question discussed in this Parliament. I can remember, as a school-boy, being on two or three occasions in the strangers' gallery of the Assembly in Auckland when this was the question of the day. On the Native question elections were determined, and upon that question Governments went in and out of office. Sir, you yourself, the member for Timaru, the member for Wanganui, and other members whom I need not name, who were the political giants of those days—I have seen you often stand up on the floor of the House and fight out your respective opinions on Native matters. We had then no Public Works policy, a comparatively small revenue, and the bulk of the administrative work of the colony was performed by the provinces. Therefore the House fell back upon the only really large question, taxing the powers of statesmen, that it had to deal with. I can recall the time when an attempt was made to separate the North and the South Islands upon Native matters, and to claim for the North Island members alone the right of interfering in and determining Native questions; and I know that one of the strongest objections taken to that proposal was taken by a South Island member who is no longer in this House, and who said that he declined to give up the Native question because he wished to keep it as a school for the rising statesmen of the colony. It was necessarily an important question at that time, because the Native people were numerous, while we were comparatively few in number; they were armed and were capable of fighting; and, while we know that our population can now afford to laugh at any attempt materially to interfere with the settlement of the Island, at that time the Natives could have made us laugh the other way. At that time we professed to be animated by the best possible desires towards the Native people. We told them that we wished only their advancement; that we wished to protect them in the occupation of their land, to educate them, to make them one with the Europeans, to teach them our laws, and in every respect to raise them to the same level as ourselves. We are now in that position when, in consequence of our superior strength and population, in consequence of the decay of the Native people, in consequence of their defeat in war on many occasions at our hands, we can afford, if we think such a course proper, to repudiate those promises. But, Sir, I mistake the temper of this House, I mistake the character of our public men, and I mistake the feeling of the country if we shall adopt a policy of that kind. I feel perfectly certain that the very fact that we are now a superior people in all respects, that it is now in our power, if we think proper, to repudiate every one of those engagements, will make us all the more anxious to fulfil them to the letter and to the spirit. I look forward to the time when there will be no Native question, when we shall be really one people, and when no special department will be necessary for the purpose of governing the Natives apart, even to the smallest extent, from their European fellow-settlers. I look forward to the time when special communication with them will be at an end; when the barrier which now exists in the King country will be removed; when the Queen's writ will run, really and truly, from one end of the country to the other; when there will reside in this country two races side by side, speaking the same language, understanding and obeying the same constitutional government; and when over and above all of them the law will

LAND BILL.

This Bill was further considered in Committee. New clause.

Mr. KELLY moved the addition of the following new clause: "Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection four of section sixty-four, it shall be lawful for the Board to dispense with personal residence if the land is rural land and wholly or mostly covered with bush."

Question put, "That the clause be a clause of the Bill;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

EDUCATION BILL.

The Hon. Major RICHMOND.—Sir, I will ask permission, before you give your ruling upon the point that was raised yesterday, to make a statement in justification of the action of the Committee in passing the clause proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley. The additional clause moved by the Hon. Mr. Buckley in the Education Bill does not appear to be in any respect an appropriation clause, but, as was suggested by the Hon. Mr. Hall, purely an administrative one. The money proposed to be granted to the Committee it is assumed has been appropriated by the General Assembly, and has been handed over to the Education Board of the particular district, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Education Act. This clause, therefore, is no appropriation of funds, nor is it a diversion of funds: it merely provides that it shall be lawful for the Board in whose hands the funds are placed to make use of those funds for the purposes of the Act. In this case it is clear that certain sums of money have been voted and are supposed to have been handed over to the various local Education Boards, and there can hardly be any question that the Legislative Council has power to initiate provisions which would authorize the Local Boards to deal in certain ways with the funds at their disposal. It is difficult to see how this can be looked upon as an appropriation or a diversion of the funds of the local Education Boards. The money belongs to the Boards, and this would appear to be not so much an enacting clause or appropriation clause as a declaratory statute—the clause appearing to carry out the intention of the Act, and to relieve the Board of each district from any doubt as to the powers which they possess in regulating the distribution of their funds for educational purposes.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—As I was the member who called the attention of the Chairman of Committees to what appeared to me to be the bearing of this particular clause, I wish to express my sense that very great blame is attributable to me for having, through inadvertence, omitted to draw the honorable gentleman's attention to the question before raising it in Committee.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I wish to say, as materially pertinent to the question, that, in the first place, I cannot regret that the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell took the public opportunity he did of drawing attention to this very important matter, because I think it covers a subject of such importance that it cannot be too clearly laid down and appreciated in all its bearings by the Council. However, as I myself am not an authority upon these subjects, I merely wished to draw your attention to the fact that a clause similar to this was not treated as an appropriation clause in another place. Had it been so it could not, in the first instance, have been taken through except in Committee of the whole House: further, as has been so clearly set forth in the memorandum read by the Chairman of Committees, it is not an appropriation of money, but a direction of money already appropriated. Practically, inasmuch as this clause in no way affects the appropriation clause, No. 8, and inasmuch as the money has already passed out of the hands of the Government and become centred under the control of the Board, inasmuch as by the appropriation clause the Government parts with all control over the money, and the money becomes vested in the new body, in that way it appears clear that this clause cannot be considered an appropriation clause. The whole subject is capable of being opened up in the widest manner; its ramifications extend into the consideration of all the varied subjects which we have touched on during the last six or seven years. It appears to me that it would be necessary, granting that we admit this to be an appropriation clause, to allege that in the Education Reserves Bill the other day we had absolutely no right to interfere with an appropriation clause and reduce the appropriation from one-fourth for high-class education to one-eighth; and so the subject opens up in the broadest manner the whole question of limitation of usefulness for the consideration of this Council. I will not detain the Council any further on this matter. The great thing for us to consider is, that in another place, which is essentially jealous of all its privileges, this was not treated as an appropriation clause, and I do not think we ought to raise difficulties which will have the effect of limiting our own usefulness in the colony.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—I think there is no doubt that this is an appropriation clause. The payment out of the Consolidated Fund is for the number of children attending schools established under the secular system. This clause is for the purpose of establishing a new system of education not contemplated under the Act, and supplementing the funds of those schools with gifts of money and books in excess of what is intended for the schools under the Government. Under this clause any description of education may be established, and therefore any money given to these schools will be altogether separate from the education intended to be given by the Government. I think, therefore, that there is no doubt that this is a breach of the privileges of the other branch of the Legislature, and should be treated as such.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—I think that this is clearly a money clause; that it is an appropriation of money in a direction which was never intended by the Bill as it came into this Council. We must be very careful before we adopt this clause and send it down to the other House. I understand that one of our Bills has already been challenged in that place, and we should pause before we trench upon the privileges of the other branch of the Legislature.

The Hon. Mr. HART.—The strongest point that weighs with me in this matter is what has been stated by the Hon. Dr. Grace, that this clause has not been treated as an appropriation clause in the other branch of the Legislature. If it was an appropriation clause it was the duty of the Speaker of the other branch of the Legislature to point out that it was, and, as a matter of ordinary rule, it should have been brought into that House in a special manner. That not having been done, it is only fair to assume that the clause was not considered by the other House, nor by the officer whose duty it is to rule on such questions, to be a money clause. Reading the clause, it is very doubtful; and I do not think this Council should be the one to narrow the ground of action which it can take in questions of this kind. It may well follow the lead of the other House in these matters. As has been remarked, the money is in the hands of the Board. The actual appropriation will not be increased or diminished. As a rule, by the Act a large amount of discretion is given to the Board with respect to dealing with the funds in its possession, and this is an intimation that any twenty-five householders within the district in which the Board acts may signify their desire to be constituted into a separate body for educational purposes, and it will then be the duty of the Board to convene a meeting of such householders for the election of a School Committee, and, when that Committee is established, to grant them aid in money and books. There are then provisions which literally bring that school under the control of the Board, namely,—

"Provided always that every such Committee shall provide a schoolhouse or schoolhouses to the satisfaction of the Board, and shall appoint and pay the teacher or teachers of such school or schools, every such teacher having first obtained a certificate of competency, as provided in section forty-four of this Act: Provided also that all books used in any such school shall be approved by the Board; and that, in every respect wherein no special exception is made in this section, every such school shall be a public school under this Act, and subject to the provisions which this Act makes for the conduct, management, and inspection of public schools; and that every such school shall be open to all children between the ages of five and fifteen years without fee or payment of any kind."

In point of fact, it is simply enabling the householders to hold a school which shall be absolutely subject to the inspection of the Board. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, the money being already in hand, that after all, whatever doubts I may entertain on the subject as far as the action of another branch of the Legislature is concerned, we have a precedent for dealing with the clause in this way.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The Government opposed this clause, it is true; but I have no wish to endeavour to throw it out upon a ground of this kind, the principle of which, if admitted, would, I think, be attended with very great injury to this Council. I think that this session we have gone a little too far, perhaps, in doubting our own powers. We have gone a great deal further than we have ever done before, and I am afraid that, if we go on in the way we are now going, in a short time there will be nothing left for us to legislate upon. Although I would willingly have seen the clause defeated, yet, as it was not defeated, I shall not allow my desire to see it excised from the Bill to conceal from me that the Council would, in my opinion, be doing a very foolish thing if we threw a doubt upon our own power to deal with the matter in any way that the majority of the Council deem proper. I am sorry to differ from those honorable gentlemen who think otherwise, and whose opinions I value; but I certainly must oppose the theory that we have not ample power to deal with a clause of this kind, which is in no respect an appropriation clause.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON.—Without wishing to take up the time of the Council, I would like to point out, in addition to what has fallen from the Hon. Mr. Hart, a point which seems to me not to have been particularly noticed—namely, that at the conclusion of the appropriation clause there is this sentence: "Subject to any such appropriation, regulations may be made prescribing the times and manner at and in which such moneys shall be paid or applied." That clearly applies to the Board, which is to say in what manner moneys shall be applied, subject to regulations. Now I come to the clause that is under discussion, and, I say, all that is there provided for is that it shall be lawful for the Board to grant: it is not a direction to the Board, but simply gives them power to grant. It seems to me it does not diminish the power of the Board, but only increases it, and that not by direction but by permission: therefore I cannot conceive that it can in any way be taken to be a question of appropriation. Besides, there is the point the Hon. Mr. Hart has alluded to, that the moment the money is applied in the manner spoken of, the school to which it is applied becomes a public school, and comes within the provisions of the Act itself.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON.—It appears to me that this clause authorizes the appropriation of money for the establishment of a class of schools that were never contemplated by the Bill as it originally came to this Chamber. The Bill simply provided for a system of secular education, and this clause proposes to take a portion of the money voted for that purpose to introduce a class of schools of another description altogether. I understand that the object of this Bill as it was introduced and passed through the other branch of the Legislature was the establishment of a purely secular system of education. Now, this clause opens the door to schools in which religious instruction of any or every kind may be given, and which are to be supported by money voted by this Legislature under an Act which provides simply for a secular system of education. To me it appears to be a subversion of the object of the Bill altogether. If we are to permit of religious instruction, let it be openly and deliberately done, and the provision, with all necessary regulations, inserted in the body of the Bill, and not introduced by a side-wind in a clause professedly for another purpose, added to the Bill after it has been adopted as providing simply a secular system of education. I cannot see how the objection to this clause on the ground of its being an appropriation clause can be surmounted. The School Board has a certain sum payable to it to support a system of secular education. If that Board, on the authority of this clause, takes and administers that money in aid of religious education, there will be a departure from the purpose for which the money was granted to the Board, which is certainly appropriation in its most objectionable form.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I wish to correct a misapprehension on the part of the honorable gentleman who has just spoken. I understood him to say that aid was to be given to a different class of schools from those referred to in the Act. I would draw the honorable gentleman's attention to the last part of the clause under discussion, which says, "Provided also that all books used in any such school shall be approved by the Board, and that, in every respect wherein no special exception is made in this section, every such school shall be a public school under this Act." Therefore it must be a public school. However, the present point is not so much as regards the clause itself as the important principle of whether it involves a breach of the privileges of the other House. I am sorry to say that I think that for some time past there has been a tendency on the part of members of this Council to give way too much to the fear that we may trench upon the privileges of the other House, and I think that we are very wrong in doing so. I contend that, whatever our privileges are, we should claim them at all times to the full extent. I must say that in this case also we seem inclined to give way. If this clause is to be considered a breach of the privileges of the other House, I do not know what rights in this respect we shall have left. As pointed out by the Hon. Dr.

Grace, it is very certain that the House of Representatives did not regard a similar clause in the light of an appropriation clause. I notice that in another colony a question of this sort has recently occurred. It appears that in Melbourne lately the Legislative Council took upon itself to strike out of the Railways Bill a certain line of railway. The action of the Council was immediately treated by the Legislative Assembly as a breach of its privileges. But the Legislative Assembly had forgotten that years previously the Council had exercised the very same power. Their action was challenged on that occasion, but they proved that they had the right to proceed as they had done, and insisted upon retaining that right. Of course the question was then set at rest, because they had the right in the first instance, and had retained it. If we keep giving way on these points we shall really have no privileges left.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK.—It strikes me that the clause proposed last night is very similar to a clause we passed before—clause 42. In this case it says the Board may set apart a certain amount of money for a certain purpose. The 42nd clause says, "The Board shall, out of the Board Fund, make such provision from time to time as it shall see fit for the following purposes." Then there are seven purposes named. It appears to me we are merely adding one other purpose to the seven provided in clause 42.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I have been asked to give an opinion in reference to the 8th clause of the Education Bill, and the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley to that clause in the shape of an additional clause. I have made inquiries, and I find that the House of Representatives went into Committee of the Whole to consider clause 8 of the Education Bill, and resolved to recommend the appropriation proposed in the clause, substituting "not exceeding three pounds fifteen shillings" for "three pounds ten shillings," which resolution, being read a second time in the House, was agreed to. The House of Representatives have thus clearly and distinctly declared that it is an appropriation clause, by going into Committee for the purpose of passing it.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I am sorry, Sir, to interrupt your ruling. The point of the argument was, that when the aided clause was under consideration in the other branch of the Legislature it was not looked upon as a money clause.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I am obliged to the honorable gentleman for his explanation, but that scarcely solves the difficulty with me. The question is with reference to this 8th clause, which has been declared by the House of Representatives to be an appropriation clause. Then the question arises if this proposed addition is only a direction of the money already appropriated; it appears to me that the terms of the 8th clause are so large that there is no necessity to give any further direction than that already provided. I go further and say, if this is an appropriation clause—which I imagine the Council has now no doubt the House of Representatives considers it to be—then I put the question, Is an appropriation clause considered an "aid to Her Majesty"? On that point I shall read an extract from the correspondence which took place on a former occasion, in 1872, which is as follows:—

"The leading resolution of the House of Commons on this point is that of the 3rd July, 1878, referred to by Mr. May as that 'upon which all proceedings between the two Houses in matters of Supply are founded,' and is as follows:—

"That all aids and supplies and aids to His Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons: and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons: and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint, in such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants: which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords."

I think language would totally fail more clearly to indicate that this 8th clause is such an "aid"; and, that being the case, we have no right to insert the proposed amendments. I am extremely sorry that, so far as I can judge from the speeches and expressions used, I am not in accord with the members of this House. But I feel it to be my bounden duty, after a most careful and painstaking examination of the whole subject, to give my opinion in accordance with what appear to be the clear facts of the case. I may say, further, that, if the question arose in Committee, and there was any doubt as to the ruling given by the Chairman of Committees, that ruling is so far final. If it is at any time decided to ascertain what is the opinion of the Council—not of the Speaker—then it is the duty of the Committee to move a resolution that reference be made to the Council for guidance. A similar case has occurred in my recollection, and then the Council was asked for its opinion. The Council itself came to a determination as to what direction it would give the Committee after asking the opinion of the Speaker. I feel that this is so important a matter—I feel that the responsibility is so heavy—that I should not be justified in ruling on the subject. Therefore I simply give my opinion, that the adoption of the amendment clause in question and sending it to the House of Representatives would be an invasion of the privileges of that House.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—Sir, as far as I can gather, your ruling and the speeches made in the Council refer to two different matters. I spoke of the clause introduced by the Hon. Mr. Buckley yesterday, but as I understand your ruling it refers to clause 8 of the Bill, with which I cannot see that it has any real connection. One is a distinct appropriation clause; the other, I believe, is not an appropriation clause at all. To the best of my belief, the clause introduced by the Hon. Mr. Buckley was not treated as an appropriation clause in another place. I thought it had been made abundantly clear that there was no new appropriation in the clause proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley, but it was only a latitude given to the Board in spending the money that came to their hands, and to allow the distribution in another manner. It appears, Sir, that I am at variance with you in regard to the question under discussion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I think it is not desirable that the Speaker should enter into an argument in support of the opinion he has expressed, but I cannot help saying, with reference to the remarks of the honorable and gallant member, that, if I am right in considering this 8th clause as an appropriation clause, then it is not in the power of the Council to change or alter the clause. That is the view I take.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—I would direct the attention of honorable members to a great misapprehension which appears to exist as to the course of procedure in the House of Representatives in such cases. From what has fallen from the Hon. Colonel Whitmore and the Hon. Dr. Grace, I gather that they think, because the House of Representatives did not go into Committee of the Whole to consider the clause known as Mr. Curtis's clause, which is identical in principle with that proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley, therefore it was not treated as an appropriation clause—

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE.—The honorable gentleman appears not to have heard what I said. I gave the Council no information as to the custom in another place. All I said was that I thought that I was at variance with the Speaker as regards the question under discussion. I considered that there was only clause 108 under discussion, and I did not see what bearing that had on clause 8. I admitted, without question, all that the Speaker said had been done in another place in regard to clause 8; but I was not speaking with reference to clause 8.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—What the House of Representatives does is this: It goes into Committee of the Whole to consider clause 8 of the Education Bill, which appropriates money. The Committee of the Whole makes a recommendation to the House to grant funds for giving effect to the objects of the Bill, but the Committee of the Whole does not prevent the Committee on the Bill from varying that appropriation. It was, therefore, quite unnecessary for the House of Representatives to go into Committee of the Whole to consider Mr. Curtis's clause. Mr. Curtis's clause, or any other clause which came within the four corners of the intention of the 8th clause, was quite in order to be received in Committee on the Bill in the House of Representatives, although it did not form part of the original Bill. But that does not make it competent for us to introduce it here.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I would draw the honorable gentleman's attention to the fact that one material part of the contention is that the appropriation is already made in clause 8. When the appropriation was made the appropriation was done with.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I would ask, Sir, what is the motion before the Council?

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—There is no question before the Council at present, and therefore this discussion is out of order.

The Hon. Mr. HALL.—I beg to move a resolution on this subject which, at any rate, will give honorable members an opportunity of discussing the question. When the matter was under discussion in Committee, I expressed an opinion that the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley was not an appropriation clause, and I gave my reasons for that opinion. At that time the matter had not been so thoroughly ventilated as it has now, and I think it is the duty of any honorable gentleman, when further discussion on a subject leads him to arrive at a somewhat different conclusion from that he had at first, not to shrink from saying so, but to state frankly that he has seen reason, if not entirely to change his views, at any rate very much to doubt the soundness of the opinion he had expressed. The manner in which this question presents itself to my mind is this: The amendment authorizes the Boards to pay certain moneys to schools to which, under the Bill as sent up to us, it could not have been paid. Either these are public schools within the meaning of the Act or they are not. If they are public schools, then, undoubtedly, we increase the amount of the appropriation which would have been payable under the Bill as it came from the other House. If that is the case, then the amendment is an appropriation clause. I am, however, bound to say that I have considerable doubt whether such schools are public schools, because the Act says a public school must be subject to the control and also under the management of the Board. These schools are subject to the control, but not to the management, of the Boards. Now, if they are not public schools, what is the position in which we place the Education Boards? We ask those Boards to pay a considerable sum of money to denominational schools without their having any corresponding increase of receipts from the Colonial Treasury. We authorize the Education Boards to pay considerable sums of money to denominational schools while in respect of those schools they do not receive any money from the Government at all. For these reasons, if this is an appropriation clause, I think we have clearly no right to pass it. If it is not an appropriation clause, we have a right to do so; but we place the Education Boards in a position of serious financial difficulty. I therefore very much doubt whether it is expedient to adhere to the clause proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley, and I give expression to that feeling in the following resolution: "That, considering that serious doubt exists whether the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Buckley in the Education Bill may not have the effect of an appropriation clause, it is, in the opinion of the Council, inexpedient to adhere to it." This does not express any definite opinion upon the subject. I am as anxious as any member of the Council that, whilst we should not trench on the privileges of the other House, we should not abandon our own; and therefore I ask the Council to say that, considering all the circumstances, it is inexpedient to adhere to the new clause.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I am glad the Hon. Mr. Hall has taken the opportunity of explaining his change of opinion. I think that on a matter of this gravity it is of the first importance that honorable members should have the courage of their opinions, whatever those opinions may be. But the arguments upon which he has based his change of opinion seem to me singularly inappropriate, singularly unequal to the gravity of the change, and singularly inapplicable to the whole case. The honorable gentleman's contention is, that either this aided clause gives assistance to public schools from funds outside the amount already appropriated in clause 8, and thus draws money from the general revenue and not from that already appropriated; or else, in providing assistance for schools which are not public schools, by diminishing the gross amount of the sum voted it interferes with the general appropriation. The honorable gentleman's further contention is that if these are private schools we are appropriating moneys for a purpose never contemplated by the Act. Now, I would direct the honorable gentleman's attention to subsection 2 of clause 8, which says,—

"In payment to the Board of every district of a sum of not exceeding three pounds fifteen shillings for each child in average daily attendance at a public school, such average daily attendance to be computed in manner prescribed by regulations."

In any case, the gross sum to be appropriated for the purposes of education cannot exceed and must not, with reservations, be less than £3 15s. per head. Well, the practical result is that the sum of £3 15s. at any rate cannot be exceeded; and the only contention the honorable gentleman can make with any show of reasoning would be this: that, if any sum at all is granted in aid of schools which by the clause under consideration are converted into public schools, that sum should be £3 15s. per head. Now, with reference to that, there is this to be said: that clearly the intention of the Act is that the appropriation must be a gross sum calculated upon the gross number, because if you look at the general distribution of money you will see that the gross sum is diminished by sums accruing from other sources—to wit, reserves and other means. Now, the truth is that any assistance given to aided schools at the option of the Board would practically be taken from the general amount for expenditure. It was never intended by the Act that the appropriation of £3 15s. was to be fixed upon the head of every single individual child. But let us take a broader view of the question. If we have not the power of directing the expenditure of this money already appropriated, then I submit that we are not in a position to decide that certain sums of money shall go for scholarships or prizes, or in any way to influence the general management of the trust created. Are we not in a position in any way to direct the general administration of the educational interests of the State? We are in a position to direct the general administration of the Education Act by altering from time to time the powers of the Boards and Committees. By doing so we are influencing the trusts under the Act, and enabling Boards and Committees to give scholarships, or directing the mode of the expenditure of the money. Where do the Boards get the funds from? They get the funds from the £3 15s., and, according to the honorable gentleman, if you do not take that sum of £3 15s. and fix it on each particular child you interfere with the appropriation clause. There is another point that is of importance to the whole subject, and that is this: Part of my original contention was, that the moment a Government part with that money by the appropriation clause the money ceases to belong to the Government and becomes vested in the Boards, and the Boards are capable of using that money according to their powers under the Act; and if we alter these powers, then we simply say to the Board that when it thinks it expedient it shall give aid to those schools, which, for the purpose of general education, shall be public schools under this Act. I must say that the whole matter appears to be clear enough. It is simply part of the ordinary machinery of the Bill which we influence in our place in this Legislature by giving a direction to Committees and Boards.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL.—Sir, I am very sorry to differ from my honorable friend. I will not take up the time of the Council by repeating the arguments which I addressed to the Hon. the Chairman of the Committee last night. There is no doubt, however, in my own mind, that the Council has no power to interfere with a decision of the House of Representatives as to the appropriation of money for this particular purpose. I have always understood that it had been acknowledged by this Council that the function of the House of Representatives was to appropriate the public money in any way they thought proper. Does my honorable friend contend that, when the House of Representatives has, in the Appropriation Bill of the year, appropriated, say, a thousand pounds, for any particular purpose, this Council has the right to alter the destination of that thousand pounds? I regret to hear the opinion expressed that this Council is waiving its rights or yielding up its privileges to the other House. I say that this Council has privileges which ought never to be yielded and rights which ought never to be waived. But when the Council claims the right to appropriate any part of the public revenue, under any pretence or condition whatever, it will seek to establish an entirely novel right, which will never be agreed to by the House of Representatives. The real point is this: whether we do propose by this amendment to make any appropriation and application of the Consolidated Fund which is different from that which the House of Representatives has made. If that is the effect of the amendment, as I say it is, then we are going entirely outside our functions. It is the representatives of the people alone who have the right to say how the public money shall be appropriated, and it is a fundamental principle that the appropriation by the Lower House shall not be interfered with by the Legislative Council.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON.—Sir, when I spoke on this subject a short time ago I had not looked at the passage which you have since read from May. I have now read it over, and it seems to me that, if that is applicable to the present case, we certainly have not the power to introduce this clause. It appears to me, however, that, under these circumstances, this is not the only case in which we have gone too far.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.—It seems to me that the House of Representatives have voted a sum of money, together with other sums of money accruing to them from public reserves and other endowments, to the extent of £3 15s. per head for every child that is educated in a public school according to certain rules laid down by this Parliament for the education of that child. It seems to me that by this amendment we now ask that the sum of £3 15s. per head shall not only be appropriated for children educated in that particular way. Now we want to take that £3 15s. per head and give it to children who are educated in a manner different from that provided by the Act. Now, the sole question is this: Has this Council the power, after the other House has appropriated a certain sum of money and said that it shall be spent on children educated in a certain manner, to say that money to the extent of £3 15s. per head shall be paid to other schools where children are educated in an exceptional manner? I do not see that this Council would be exceeding its privileges if it gave its opinion that the money should not be appropriated in the manner proposed by the other House. Of course, if the House of Representatives appropriated £1,000 for expenditure on roads or bridges in a certain district, the money would have to be spent in that particular way; but I do not think this is an analogous case. I really think this Council has a right to make the alteration suggested and submit it for the consideration of the other branch of the Legislature, after which, if they disagree with us, we can discuss the question as to whether or not we have exceeded our rights.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I wish to call the attention of the Council to clause 8. That clause was treated as an appropriation clause in the other House, and it was introduced in Committee of Supply. When the Bill was before us on a previous occasion there was no doubt in the minds of honorable members that we could not interfere with any part of the appropriation clause. We could either strike the clause out altogether or pass it, but we could not amend it. The last part of clause 8 is as follows: "Subject to any such appropriation, regulations may be made prescribing the times and manner at and in which such moneys shall be paid or applied." Now, if honorable members will turn to clause 42—which, I may say, is not an appropriation clause—they will see that it says,—

"Every Board shall, out of the Board Fund, make such provision from time to time as to it shall seem fit for the following purposes, namely—(1.) For the payment of salaries and other expenses connected with the carrying on of the business of such Board. (2.) For the expense of purchasing or renting school sites, playgrounds, and buildings, or for erecting, fitting up, and improving school buildings. (3.) For the payment of teachers' salaries. (4.) For the maintenance and education of pupil-teachers. (5.) For grants to Committees for general educational purposes."

(6.) For subsidizing school libraries. (7.) And generally for the payment of all expenses necessarily incurred by such Board or any Committee under their supervision in the carrying out of any of the provisions of this Act."

It is very certain that the Council could alter that clause in any manner it thought proper without in any way interfering with the privileges of the other House. I will go further, and point out that I hold in my hand the copy of Hansard which records the division which took place when the clause we are now considering was introduced in Committee in the House of Representatives. This particular clause was not considered an appropriation clause, and it was not introduced in Committee of Supply. Therefore I say that in dealing with this clause we are not interfering with the privileges of the other House. It is the principle that I look to, and I shall be very sorry if, in declining to adopt the clause, we give up any one of our privileges. I shall call for a division on the subject, in order to place on record my opinion regarding it.

Question put, "That the motion be agreed to;" on which a division was called for, with the following result:—

PRIVATE BILLS.

The Hon. Mr. HART, in moving the motion standing in his name, thought it must be obvious to every member of the Council that a number of Bills of a local character came before the Council, particularly towards the end of the session, which could not receive that consideration which they ought to receive if they were to be intelligently passed; and the circumstance that they came before the Council when so many other Bills of a serious character demanded consideration as to their meaning, sense, and bearing, necessarily made it a matter of haphazard whether they were passed or not, because the Council did not like to pass any measures without understanding them and thoroughly appreciating their objects. In the Imperial Parliament, Bills of this kind were introduced after a certain amount of previous ceremony. Notices of the intention to introduce them were published, and they were introduced within a certain period after the commencement of the session. They had to undergo a certain scrutiny before they were submitted to the House, and after undergoing that scrutiny they were rejected or proceeded with in accordance with the result of the scrutiny. Here they had none of those safeguards. These Bills were introduced as public Bills. They were examined or were not examined, as the case might be, and the Council was called on to pass them at a late period of the session, when it could not possibly give proper attention to them. He would not discuss the matter further. The mischief which the motion was intended to remove must have made itself obvious to every member of the Council who had given himself the trouble near the end of the session to study Bills which certainly ought to have been introduced at the beginning of the session.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is desirable that a Committee should be appointed at the commencement of every session, to act with a similar Committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to whom should be referred for examination and report all local Bills. Such Committee to have power to call for persons and papers. That the Standing Orders should provide that all local Bills shall be introduced into Parliament within the first four weeks of each session. And that such reference should in each case be, of course, upon the first reading of the Bill. That it be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders to frame the necessary additions thereto. That the Hon. the Speaker be requested to communicate with the Speaker of the House of Representatives on the subject of these resolutions."—(Hon. Mr. Hart.)

The Hon. Major RICHMOND said the Standing Orders Committee were at present engaged in the consideration of a very similar matter; and he would therefore move, That the matter be referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL understood the purport of the amendment to be that the resolution, before being adopted by the Council, should be referred to the Standing Orders Committee. That was a course which would commend itself to the consideration of honorable members at once. There were many points in the resolution to which he had serious objections. In the first place, he doubted very much whether they should hurriedly adopt the suggestion to appoint a Joint Committee. Then, again, the definition of what should be held to constitute local Bills would require much more careful consideration than would be secured by the adoption of this resolution. To the last two lines of the resolution he should altogether object, because he imagined that this resolution, or any other of a similar purport, was of such importance that, instead of being left to the Speaker of the Council to communicate with the other branch of the Legislature, it should be transmitted to the House of Representatives with a message asking their concurrence. The amendment of the Hon.

Major Richmond would meet all his objections; and not only that, but he hoped it would meet the views of the Hon. Mr. Hart.

Amendment agreed to.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE moved the following new clause: "At every election for a School Committee every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of the Committee to be elected, and may give all such votes to one candidate or may distribute them among the candidates, as he thinks fit."

Question put, "That the proposed clause stand part of the Bill;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

Mr. KELLY asked the Government, What action they intend to take with reference to the report of the Public Petitions Committee in the case of the petition of the Chairman of the New Zealand Titanic Steel and Iron Company (Limited)? The company was entitled to 5,000 acres of land upon compliance with certain conditions specified in the Act of 1874, but the Government had been advised that the grant could not be issued, the conditions not having been fulfilled. The chairman of the company petitioned the House, and the petition was referred to the Public Petitions Committee, who found that the conditions had not been complied with, and recommended, in consequence of the large expenditure the company had gone to, that, if they produced 100 tons of iron within a time to be fixed by the Government, the grants should issue. The question was now in abeyance, and he wished to know what the Government intended to do in the matter.

Sir G. GREY did not think the Government had power to issue the grant unless the existing Act was first altered. The Government concurred in the report of the Committee, and would endeavour to give effect to it.

DEFENCES OF THE COLONY.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, When the Government expect Sir William Jervois and Colonel Scratchley will arrive in Wellington to examine into the defences of the colony? Sir William Jervois having been appointed Governor of South Australia, and Colonel Scratchley having been appointed Master of the Mint of Victoria, he was under the impression that the services of these distinguished officers would no longer be available for the Government of New Zealand for the purpose of examining into the defences of the colony. He therefore wished to ask the Colonial Secretary if he was right in supposing that such was the case, or whether it would be possible to obtain the services of those gentlemen, and, if so, when they would be expected to arrive in New Zealand.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that His Excellency the Governor, at the request of Ministers, telegraphed to the Secretary of State to obtain the services of Sir William Jervois and Colonel Scratchley some months ago. Since the arrival of Sir William Jervois in Australia correspondence had taken place between His Excellency and Sir William Jervois, resulting in a promise that Sir William would visit New Zealand about the middle of December next, commencing his examination in the South and proceeding North. Sir William Jervois said that he would write again, giving the exact date of his intended arrival in New Zealand. He was to visit Tasmania first, and, of course, would not come to New Zealand until he had completed his examination and report on the defences of that colony. The Government would make due provision for his visit on the Estimates.

EDUCATION BILL.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE moved the recommitment of this Bill, for the purpose of reconsidering clause 63. This course was rendered necessary because the Council had passed a new clause, enacting that cumulative voting by ballot should be the method of electing members of School Committees. The 63rd clause of the Bill provided that the electors present at the annual meeting "shall proceed to elect, either by show of hands or by ballot, as shall be determined upon by the said meeting." The two clauses were therefore incompatible, and, as the new clause had been affirmed by a majority of the Council, he presumed that the clauses must be made to coincide.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES wished to bring the following point under the notice of the Hon. the Speaker. On the 4th October the Hon. Colonel Whitmore proposed that the principle of cumulative voting should obtain in the election of members of the Board, but the proposal was rejected by a considerable majority. On the 7th November the Hon. Dr. Grace proposed that the cumulative principle should be introduced into the election of School Committees. That proposal was also negative. On the 16th November the Hon. Dr. Grace brought forward substantially the same proposal. The language of the proposal was not identical, but substantially it was a proposal that the cumulative principle should be introduced into the election of School Committees. The point which he wished to bring under the notice of the Hon. the Speaker was whether these repeated proposals did not infringe the 136th Standing Order. He brought the matter under the consideration of the Chairman of Committees when the Bill was in Committee, and the Chairman ruled, with perfect justice, that, as the matter had been remitted to the Committee by the Council, the Committee had no power to deal with the question. The Standing Order was to this effect: "No question or amendment may be proposed which is the same in substance as any question or amendment which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative." Looking at the fact that the question agreed to in Committee on Friday last was the same in substance as one proposed by the Hon. Dr. Grace on the 7th November, which was then rejected, he wished to know whether the renewed motion of Friday last was not in violation of the Standing Order.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said there was no doubt that, after a Committee had passed a proposition in the affirmative, the Bill might be recommitted, and the same proposition negatived, or vice versa. A Committee might alter or vary any provisions in a Bill on recommitment. The rule to which the Hon. Mr. Menzies referred applied only to substantive questions which came before the whole Council.

The Hon. Major RICHMOND said the ruling which he gave on Friday evening was given on the principle that objection should have been taken to the proposal before the Bill went into Committee. The Council having remitted the clause for the consideration of the Committee, the Committee, he held, would not have been justified in refusing to consider the proposal on the ground that it was identical with a proposal that had already been rejected by the Council.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said he did not take any action in reference to the point raised, because neither he nor the Council could interfere unless the question were remitted for the decision of the Council, which was not done in this particular case. The 136th Standing Order said, "No question or amendment may be proposed which is the same in substance as any question or amendment which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative." But if his honorable friend Mr. Menzies would look at the head of the page he would find that the Standing Order came under the heading "Orders of the Day, Motions, &c.;" but it had always been an accepted rule in the Council that any and every proposal might be affirmed or negatived again and again during the several stages of a Bill.

The Hon. Mr. HALL pointed out that the date fixed in clause 64 at which the annual elections of School Committees should take place would be very inconvenient for people resident in the country districts. It was suggested during the discussion on the Bill that as early a period as the beginning of January should be fixed, if he recollected aright, and the Colonial Secretary promised that the subject should receive consideration. If his honorable friend had considered the matter, and had no strong reason to urge against it, he hoped the time fixed for the elections would be altered.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY moved, That clause 8 should also be considered when the Bill was recommitted, with the view to its excision.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL hoped the Council would not hastily interfere with the decision arrived at in regard to an appropriation clause. If the Hon. Mr. Buckley objected to the decision come to, his best course would be to move that the Bill be discharged.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said the Bill had had so many narrow escapes during its progress through the Council that those who desired to see it passed would be acting prudently to allow it to be read a third time, leaving any necessary corrections to be made in another place or by Conference. The safest course for the Council to adopt now, assuming it to be the desire of honorable gentlemen that an Education Bill should be passed, would be to allow it for this year to pass through the General Assembly with whatever imperfections it possessed. If there were any further delay, and any difficulty were to be created between the two Houses about the 8th clause, the best thing to be done would be, as the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell had suggested, to move the discharge of the Bill.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE was rather amused that his honorable friend Dr. Menzies, who was so tired of the subject, should move the recommitment of the Bill for the purpose of discussing the cumulative principle. It was unreasonable that the honorable gentleman, who was so much dissatisfied with him (Dr. Grace) for having persisted in bringing the subject forward, should now recommit the Bill to bring it forward himself.

The Hon. Captain FRASER said the people of Otago had paid as much as £17,000 in school fees, and paid it most willingly. They would be ashamed to accept any charitable system of education.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said they had discussed the question ad nauseam. If they wished to impose these capitation-fees they could easily do so at some future time. The Bill would not be like the laws of the Medes and Persians; it could be altered at any time. He thought, on the other hand, that the cumulative principle might be tried for one year. It was carried by a bare majority after a good deal of argument, and, although he had voted against it, he was prepared to let the majority have its way. The Council had better let the Bill be read a third time. He did not quite know why the Hon. the Colonial Secretary wished them to go into Committee.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE explained that the 63rd clause provided for the election of Committees either by a show of hands or by ballot; but another clause which had been passed provided that the Committee should be elected by ballot according to the principle of cumulative voting. He did not see, therefore, how the 63rd clause could be left in its present position.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said that was a matter of detail, and he had no objection to go into Committee on that clause.

Question put, "That the Bill be recommitted for the reconsideration of clause 8;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

TARANAKI COUNTY RESERVES BILL.

The Hon. Mr. HALL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to vest in the County of Taranaki certain reserves which had been made for the improvement of roads in the Tarururangi, Hua, and Waiwakaiho Road Districts. He held in his hand a Gazette under which these reserves were made, but since that had been done the roads had been included in the county, and the districts had petitioned to have the reserves transferred, for the purpose for which they were made, to the County of Taranaki. The Public Petitions Committee of the other branch of the Legislature recommended that the petitions should be complied with, but that one part of them should not be complied with—namely, that the county should have power to sell the reserves. The Committee recommended that power should only be given to lease the reserves for forty-two years. The object of the Bill was merely to transfer the reserves from one body to another in order to apply them to the purpose for which they were originally set apart.

Sir F. DILLON BELL merely wished to intimate that he should subject the proposal to a very careful examination when the Bill went before the Waste Lands Committee. His honorable friend said it was not proposed to change the object for which the reserves were set apart; but, so far as he understood the matter, the object was distinctly different. The original reserves were made for the improvement of the roads in the Tarururangi, and Hua and Waiwakaiho Districts. The Bill provided that the reserves should be handed over to the Taranaki County Council in trust for the improvement of the "Junction Road." As he had before said, he should now watch with jealousy any attempts to divert reserves from their original purposes.

The Hon. Mr. HALL could only say that the reserves were set apart for the improvement of roads in the district mentioned, and they were now to be applied for the improvement of the Junction Road, in the same county. He assumed that the Junction Road was part of the original district; but, of course, if there was any substantial difference in the matter, it would be carefully inquired into by the Waste Lands Committee.

Bill read a second time.

The Council adjourned at half-past five o'clock p.m.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

On the motion, That the House go into Committee of Supply,

Mr. LARNACH said, — Mr. Speaker: Sir, the Hon. the Premier, a few evenings ago, in his statement of the proposed future policy of the Government, informed the House that it was our desire to consolidate the administrative system of the colony, and to introduce a clear, comprehensive, economical, and stable plan of finance. This, Sir, is a work on the advisability of which I think all honorable members must agree; and all will no doubt agree that a work of such a nature cannot be properly accomplished without full consideration. Under these circumstances, there are two courses open to us:—

Firstly, to ask the House to vote supplies for a period of three or four months; to adjourn; to meet again at an early period of next year,—when we should be enabled to place all our plans before you in a matured form,—and then to take your verdict upon them; or,

Secondly, to take up the Estimates of the late Government, make such modifications in their proposals as we might deem necessary, and occupy ourselves during the recess in fully reorganising and consolidating the present financial and departmental systems of the colony.

Sir, the latter is the course which we have determined to adopt. At the same time that we resolve to do this, the House has a right to expect that we should at least indicate our views upon the present financial condition of the colony, the character of the changes we propose to make, and the necessity that, in our opinion, exists for making those changes.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE LATE COLONIAL TREASURER.

The late Colonial Treasurer has laid before this House an elaborate Financial Statement, furnished with all the tables and returns that usually accompany such an important document. I therefore, Sir, feel myself somewhat relieved of the duty of entering to any great extent into minute details. I will at once admit, Sir, that it would be impossible for me to attempt to place more clearly before this House than the late Hon. Colonial Treasurer has done, all details in reference to the different loans which this colony has from time to time contracted; nor have I the time or the means, at this very late period of the session, to revise them. The Government has no other course to adopt but to accept them. So, also, with regard to the expenditure: anxious as we are to effect changes of system by means of rearrangement, economy, and consolidation, yet—as more than one-third of the present financial year has already elapsed, and as much patient inquiry is requisite to prevent changes and reorganization of this kind becoming mischievous and even dangerous to the public service—I feel that I have no other course open to me at the present time than to accept the estimates of expenditure nearly as they appear in the tables recently submitted by the late Treasurer. If, however, by the circumstances of the case I am necessarily precluded from dealing with details, I ask the attention of the House for a short time whilst I endeavour, from my point of view, to indicate briefly the tendency of our present system of finance, the evils to which it is rapidly leading, and the only available remedy that I can see possible to enable this colony, without imposing enormous burdens upon the people, to maintain its credit, and to bring to a successful issue the great policy of Immigration and Public Works to which the colony is pledged by the contracts it has entered into in relation to the works that are in progress—besides the promises of works to be initiated.

EARLIER MEETINGS OF PARLIAMENT NECESSARY.

One striking defect in the present system of conducting the public expenditure is, that the General Assembly frequently meets some time after the commencement of a new financial year. After the meeting of Parliament, a period of several months sometimes elapses before the Act of Appropriation passes the Assembly.

Under such a system the expenditure is conducted without any appropriation having been made; and is incurred solely upon the authority of Imprest Supply Acts, which direct the moneys to be charged in a manner thereafter to be expressed in the appropriation of the year. From this it results that the Government is able to incur any expenditure it pleases, by simply placing on an Estimate any amount for any service which it thinks proper to undertake; and the duty of the Assembly resolves itself rather into the ratification of expenditure incurred during several months of the year than a careful watching of amounts which it is asked to vote. To cure this system, one of the duties of the present Government will be either to alter the time of the commencement of the financial year, or to take care that the Assembly meets at an earlier period, say not later than the first week in June.

TREASURY BILLS AND OTHER FLOATING DEBTS.

Sir, in the financial year 1874-75 there were outstanding Treasury bills—that is, loans raised to meet deficiencies in the revenues of previous years, and chargeable on the Consolidated Fund—to the extent of £400,000. That amount was due and payable in that year; but the Consolidated Fund was unable to bear so large a charge. It was, however, hoped that this sum might be gradually reduced by the payment out of revenue of £100,000 per annum until the whole amount was extinguished. If that sanguine expectation had been realized, there would be outstanding now only £200,000 of Treasury Bills, of which sum a moiety would vanish concurrently with the present financial year; but the present tendency is in an opposite direction, for the amount of Treasury bills in existence is now above £800,000—more than double the original sum referred to of 1874-75, and, instead of there having occurred any decrease in this particular form of the colony's indebtedness, the original sum may now safely be multiplied by two. Not only have we been unable out of the superfluities of the present to pay off the deficiencies of the past, but the necessities of the present have shown themselves to be far greater than before, and the charge upon the Consolidated Fund has now become so large that to meet these Treasury bills out of the Fund upon which they are by law a proper charge appears to me to be hopeless. In the year 1875-76, a further issue of Treasury bills was requisite in aid of revenue to the amount of £172,000. In the last year, a further issue of £260,000 became necessary; and the late Colonial Treasurer proposed to repeat a similar temporary borrowing this year "as a receipt in aid," but for this occasion the Fund upon which the advance is to be secured is not the Consolidated Fund or the ordinary revenue of the colony, but the Land Fund of the Provincial District of Otago. A similar loan would have been raised on the security of Canterbury, had it not been found possible to take £58,000 in cash from its territorial revenue. Such a condition of affairs as this, Sir, is not considered by us in any way satisfactory. There appears to be a sad want of that equilibrium—that evenness of balance—in our financial system which, before all things, must exist if we intend to maintain our position as a solvent State, our reputation as prudent, careful colonists, and, above all, our credit in the English money market.

OUR POSITION WITH REGARD TO PROVINCIAL LIABILITIES.

Nor, Sir, is this all: if it were, perhaps it would not be so difficult to secure an even balance between our means and our requirements as, I fear, may possibly be the case—or, to use a homely phrase, to learn how to make both ends meet.

Last session this House finally determined to abolish the provincial system, and in so doing had to make all provincial liabilities colonial liabilities, for which this House has to make provision. The burden which has been undertaken by that policy is, in my opinion, greater than was ever anticipated. The difficulty of ascertaining the amount of provincial liabilities seems to be very great, and that of finding the means wherewith to liquidate them when ascertained seems to me to be still greater.

Up to the 30th June last, the sum of £237,500 had been advanced from loan to meet payment of provincial liabilities, and there existed on that date, overdrafts at the bank on Provincial Account, the sum of £105,888, or an aggregate sum of £343,388, which total may be reduced by £45,888, being the amount of balances in hand to meet liabilities on Provincial Account, thus leaving still unsupported the sum of £297,500.

Sir, so much I have said for the period up to the 30th June last, and from that time I may be allowed to travel upon a different and perhaps more uneven track. There are known to be, at the date on which I am now speaking, still further liabilities on Provincial Account outstanding, amounting to £279,766, reducible by about £30,000 due from Land Fund and other sources, leaving a total to be provided for in some manner of £249,766. And the House, I think, will agree with me that still further liabilities in this direction will yet most surely present themselves. In the statement of these liabilities, which I found in preparation for the late Treasurer, they appear to reach a total of £660,000.

There is a sum of £100,000 to be paid in September next to the Wellington Trust and Loan Company, for money lent to carry on the important reclamation improvement undertaking on the foreshore of the harbour of this city. It is true that the work contracted for promises undeniably to be a reproductive one. The land is security for the outlay, and very good security too; but still, Sir, the works are not yet finished, and are not likely to be completed before or on the date upon which the payment becomes due, and it can hardly be expected that sales to any extent of sections can take place for some time to come. The money, no doubt, can be re-borrowed upon the same security, perhaps even on better terms than originally; and, if there were no greater difficulties to face than this, my task would be much easier than I apprehend it will be.

From the Statement of the late Colonial Treasurer the House will have seen that there remain no available balances from loans upon which I can pretend permanently to charge any of these payments; but, on the other hand, it is absolutely necessary to go into the money market, under disadvantageous circumstances, to borrow still further; and, to attempt to do so upon anything like reasonable terms, we must be prepared to show a state of finance characterized by soundness and stability.

UNSTABLE CHARACTER OF RECENT COLONIAL FINANCE.

I ask, Sir, has there been exhibited any stability in the finance of this colony during the recent past? By the Abolition Act a financial arrangement, supposed to be of a very definite and permanent character, was arrived at in reference to the Land Fund. This grand arrangement, promising durability and stability, never even saw the daylight of its existence, but fell still-born; and great difficulties would have arisen from this cause had not certain provisions in the Financial Arrangements Act of last session come to the rescue of colonial finance. These are the very provisions the late Government proposed again to alter this year; thus removing every trace of fixity and finality from the finance of the colony.

Now, Sir, to meet all these exigencies, to make the large payments on account of interest that this colony has periodically to make, to pay salaries, and to provide for the innumerable other matters that have daily to be met, what, I ask, is the present state of the Treasury chest? I have been accustomed, Sir, to deal, and I prefer to deal, with cash. It is very much more satisfactory and more convincing to deal with cash than with mere book-keeping accounts: with the latter, it is not difficult to manipulate balances; with the former, it is not easy to show two sovereigns where in reality only one exists.

STATE OF THE PUBLIC ACCOUNT ON OUR ENTRY INTO OFFICE.

On the 18th day of October last, the day on which this Government assumed office, there stood to the credit of the colony altogether, as shown by its banking accounts, the sum of £762,312 11s. 3d. Surely, Sir, with such an overflowing Treasury as this, the House will wonder what need there is for any financial difficulty. I shall at once proceed, Sir, to show the House of what this balance chiefly consists.

To the credit of the Consolidated Fund there was £105,563 7s. 8d.; to the credit of the Land Fund, £544,548 11s. 6d. I shall now lay before the House a full statement of cash balances in hands of bankers on the day to which I have referred, also a similar statement, for comparison, of the 16th instant, with the amounts of the balances of each one of the numerous departmental accounts.

THE LAND FUND—ITS PRESENT POSITION.

The whole of the Land Fund is appropriated by special enactment. The Government has no power, however large in any one year that Fund may become, to touch one shilling of it, for any purpose whatever, beyond that amount which the law places at its disposal. The whole of the residue is to be distributed in certain defined proportions to the counties of the respective provincial districts in which it is raised. An accumulated and excessive Land Fund, under the present laws of this colony, can never be used by the Government, even temporarily, in aid of a deficient Colonial Treasury. The land sales this year, I feel pleasure in saying, will be largely in excess of the sum estimated by the late Government. Their estimate was £743,000. To September 30th, there had actually been paid into the Treasury the sum of £542,231 19s. 4d.

Mr. Larnach

I do not mean to say that I anticipate four times that sum as the land revenue for the year, but I think it is quite reasonable to suppose that the respectable total of one million will be realized. After paying all subsidies to Municipalities, Road Boards, &c., as provided by law, the residue, however large, has to be paid to the County Councils.

I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that, while the Land Fund receipts have on the whole been largely in excess of the estimate, that excess has entirely arisen from the large sums realized in the Provincial District of Canterbury, while in the other provincial districts the amount realized has been much under the estimate.

PROPOSALS REGARDING FUTURE DISPOSITION OF THE LAND FUND.

Sir, although the land revenue has nominally been regarded and treated as provincial revenue, yet, in point of fact and actually, it has, by various enactments during the past few years, been gradually encroached upon and absorbed to such an extent that, in reality, the idea that a large proportion is available for localization is a delusion, only calculated to mislead the minds of the people as to the real position of affairs—such proportion not being for the most part derived from actual land sales, but from Treasury bills. Under such circumstances, it is desirable that the subject should be placed upon a more certain and satisfactory footing: with which view, and for the purpose of simplifying the Public Accounts, we propose to do openly and straightforwardly that which our predecessors in office have hitherto been doing indirectly and disingenuously. Sir, we mean to make the Land Fund colonial revenue, subject to all the obligations which the colony has undertaken in respect thereof, such as cost of administration, cost of survey, immigration, interest on provincial loans, and so forth. It is our intention, however, that 20 per cent. of the land revenue shall be localized by law for the purpose of being expended by the local authorities on roads, bridges, and public works within their respective districts; and, further, we shall ask Parliament to agree to one uniform land law, whereby the public estate, subject to classification, shall be sold at uniform prices throughout the colony, whether on a system embracing free selection, deferred payments, or otherwise.

Sir, I wish it also to be understood that, if administrative reforms and reduction of expenditure can be effected to an extent which may allow of any increase of the proportion of 20 per cent. referred to, such proportion shall have the benefit of it accordingly.

On this subject I desire to add that, while the circumstances into which the colony has been permitted to drift render it imperative that the land revenue should be dealt with as we have just proposed, my colleagues and myself fully recognize that one of the most legitimate objects to which that revenue ought to be applied is to render available for settlement the particular locality from whence it has been derived: in fact, this ought to be regarded as one of the main conditions upon which the purchase-money is paid. We are therefore of opinion that, in apportioning the public revenue throughout the colony, such condition should be faithfully kept in view.

Before proceeding further, I may be permitted to say that the Government looks forward to being enabled to submit to this House next session well-considered proposals, based upon sound data, whereby important districts may be opened up and connected with the main railway lines by means of branch lines, to be constructed out of the proceeds of the land, which will be rendered valuable and accessible by such branch lines. There are at present, as honorable members are aware, extensive areas of public territory throughout the colony which are unavailable for settlement, and which must continue to be so until rendered accessible by railways or roads. This is a matter in respect to which the Government looks with favour upon the action that has been taken during the present session by private members. We are of opinion, however, that it is a subject which, in the future, ought to be dealt with by the Government, and we shall be prepared to devote to it that consideration which its importance deserves.

MAINTENANCE AND REPAIR OF MAIN LINES OF ROADS AND BRIDGES.

The Government has daily, since in office, had brought under its notice the necessity of taking some steps to protect and keep in repair the main roads and bridges of the colony; and, although, by the legislation of last year, the counties were created to do this work, I regret to say they have been unable in too many cases to grapple with the difficulties of the task thereby imposed upon them; and, if the Government, after due consideration, find it to be to the interest of the colony that it should undertake the work, it will not fail to do so, even if a portion of the subsidies payable to any local bodies benefited by any particular road or public work may have to be diverted for that purpose.

REDUCTION IN DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURE.

Some interest has been excited by that portion of the Hon. the Premier's Statement which had relation to a reduction in the salaries of Ministers. There is a very laudable curiosity abroad as to the extent and nature of these proposed reductions, which I desire at once to gratify. In the year 1873, the salaries of Ministers were raised from the sum of £1,000 per annum each to £1,750 for the Premier, and £1,250 each for other Ministers. We shall propose a revision of the Civil List, and we shall ask the House to fix the Premier's salary at £1,000, and the salary of each of the other Ministers at the same amount. We propose to sell—not privately—one of the steam-vessels now the property of the Government. The Public Accounts Committee report on the advisability of selling the "Hinemoa;" but, before determining which boat to dispose of, we shall be guided by careful and sound advice from officers practically qualified to give it.

In dealing with the Civil List it will be our object to maintain the efficiency of the Public Service, and not to cut down salaries of necessary officers, but to consolidate offices as much as possible. In this direction we have reason for believing that much can be done towards effecting a very large saving in the annual expenditure of the colony.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT.

We look forward to an early report from the Committee appointed at the beginning of the session to inquire into railway management, from which we expect to obtain much valuable information for our future guidance in the conduct of the most important of the public works of the colony. In whatever direction the report may point, we shall be prepared to give it most serious consideration, and to inform the House of the result of our deliberations. A Commission appointed during the recess to inquire into the management of the Auckland lines reported very strongly in favour of leasing them. If the recommendations of the Commission referred to are supported by the report of the Committee, we shall not hesitate, either in regard to the Auckland lines or any other of our railways, to ask this House to favourably consider them, with a view of effecting a saving in the colonial expenditure, as we believe there is room for considerable reduction in the cost to the colony of its present system of railway management.

PROVISION FOR RECONSTRUCTION OF LINES.

While dealing with the question of our railways, I am compelled to call the attention of the House to a matter of the most serious importance. We have been accustomed for the last two or three years to hear of revenue derived from railways, but that revenue was simply the balance of profit after deducting the cost of ordinary maintenance and working expenses from the gross receipts. The necessity of providing for the renewal of the various lines—a point in respect of which the fullest and most careful provision has always been made in the great railway system of the mother-country—has in our case been entirely overlooked. It is impossible to over-estimate the serious significance which this absolute necessity will have on our future finance. With our system of light narrow-gauge railways, the question of renewal is much more important than it is at Home. At this late period of the session we cannot propose to deal with the matter, but it will form a leading feature in our Public Works policy of next year.

PROPOSED NEW LOAN.

Sir, I desire, before I conclude, to say a few words upon the views of the Government as to the extent of the further borrowing powers to which we shall have to ask the Committee to assent. It has not been easy, in the midst of the hurry of the session, with all the political and departmental business appertaining to offices on my hands, to have met you with a statement of our views on this subject to-night; nor has it been less difficult for my honorable colleagues and myself to arrive at a determination as to the sum necessary to be borrowed to meet our present requirements.

Sir, it is our intention to ask the House to consent to a loan of £4,000,000, feeling assured that the whole of this amount will be wanted. We propose, Sir, to redeem the guaranteed debentures, to provide for our public works, for provincial liabilities, for other necessities of the year, and for all floating debts now due by the colony; but there is also the million due to the two banks, which we have not provided for here. At present we have loans raised in London, loans raised in Sydney, loans raised in this colony, and we have the Treasury bills before referred to. The Government deem it desirable that this system should cease, and that there should be but one sort of funded colonial indebtedness for this colony, showing at a glance the entire debt; one current or working account, showing our annual revenue and expenditure under their several principal heads; and that the numerous small and mystifying accounts and balances at present existing under the heading of the Public Account should be done away with; and that we should, as far as possible, have but one creditor—I mean the London money market. The practice of concealing—perhaps unintentionally—the amount of the colonial indebtedness by the issue of Treasury bills, and the raising of temporary loans in the colonies, has an effect even worse than imposing directly on the Home creditor. It encourages the people of this colony to fancy their liabilities to be smaller than they really are, and to agitate for a greater expenditure than the colony can afford. Fuller details of these questions will be given when the Loan Bill is brought down.

TAXATION.

We shall, however, during the recess, seriously address ourselves to the consideration of large reductions in the public expenditure, which, we have reason for believing, can be carried out, and we will also earnestly consider the question already discussed in this House of altering the present system of taxation in this colony, with the view of more equally and fairly distributing its burdens upon the whole community.

Should our land receipts keep up, I apprehend that it will not be necessary to attempt to raise a larger revenue from the people than is now drawn from them, but, should that source of revenue fall off, we must be prepared to submit to heavier burdens, to meet our obligations to our creditor, and conduct the business of the country. After the experience to be gained during the recess, we shall be in a better position to offer an opinion on the subject when Parliament meets next year.

ACTUAL PRESENT POSITION OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.

With this Statement I propose to lay before the House a table, marked No. 1, showing the estimated revenue from all sources, including land, and the expenditure for the present year, based upon the state of things which the Government found in existence upon taking office. This document is worthy the attention of the House:

The estimated revenue appears...	£3,699,026
The deficiency therefore is ...	711,212

If the revenue as stated above falls short of the estimated amount, as is not improbable, that deficiency will be proportionally increased.

I also lay before the House a table, marked No. 2, showing, without the Land Fund, the estimated revenue and expenditure for the same period. This is a very important table, and from it will be gathered at a glance our true financial position, as we are at present conducting the business of the country.

It will be observed that the present daily expenditure of the colony is in excess of its estimated revenue—minus the land revenue—£1,926. I feel it my duty to call the attention of honorable gentlemen to this state of things, and to ask for their earnest consideration of the subject.

CONCLUSION.

Sir, in making this Statement, I do so with feelings of great diffidence. My position here is not of my own seeking, nor is the business I am now engaged in that towards which my tastes and inclinations would willingly have led me. So far as my humble abilities have served to guide me, I have cheerfully given my most earnest attention, with as much time as I had at my disposal, to the subject of our finance. My future aim will be to endeavour to arrange a system that may prove stable, that will secure a state of equilibrium between our revenue and our expenditure, that will be of a character sufficiently fair not to excite the cupidity of one portion of the country or the envy of another; and, as this House in its wisdom has determined, and the colony at large has agreed in that determination, to try to bring the whole of this country—differing as it does in common interests, in the manner of its colonization, and in its topographical features—under one united Government, so will it be the object of my colleagues and myself to assist in the realization of this effort by simplifying and regulating our too abundant partnership accounts, and introducing a system of united finance, without which a wholesome united Government is impossible.

Mr. STEVENS.—Will the Colonial Treasurer be good enough to let us know from what date he proposes to begin the generalization of the Land Fund?

Mr. LARNACH.—That is a matter we leave entirely in the hands of the House; but it will not be retrospective.

Major ATKINSON.—Are we to understand that the Government will make the Committee of Supply the first Order of the day for to-morrow? I do not wish to press the Government unduly, but I was unable to gather from the Statement of the honorable gentleman whether or not it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to take the Land Fund from the 30th June last.

Mr. MACANDREW.—That is not the intention.

Major ATKINSON.—Then what is the proposal?—because it will materially affect the views of honorable members in deciding on the course they may adopt. If the honorable gentleman will inform us what are the intentions of the Government as to when the proposals shall take effect, then we shall have something before us. We can then discuss the Financial Statement intelligently, but we cannot do that until we learn those matters in respect of which I have asked questions.

Mr. REYNOLDS.—I think we should not go into this matter to-night. We shall have quite time enough to talk about that when the discussion comes on. No doubt there will be a great many other inquiries besides this. For my own part, I may say that I am quite ready to proceed to the discussion of the Financial Statement at once. It has been circulated: members can read it through, and in half an hour come to a conclusion. I can determine in half an hour what I shall do—whether I can support it or not.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am sorry to say that I have not the same ability as the honorable member for Port Chalmers. I could not understand the Financial Statement in half an hour, or in two or three hours. Some of the proposals have quite taken my breath away, and I should like to have time to consider them; therefore I think it is only fair to the Government and to the Opposition that this debate should be adjourned. The honorable member for Egmont wishes to know when these proposals are to take effect, and, as rests the whole thing upon that, I think we ought to get some information on that point at once. Then there is another question: When does the honorable gentleman propose to bring down his Loan Bill? I think the information asked for is very reasonable, and I do not see that the Government have any reason at all for declining to make the declarations we invite them to make.

Mr. J. E. BROWN moved, That the House do now adjourn.

Major ATKINSON.—I hope the honorable gentleman will give us an answer to the questions which we have put. I hear some honorable members say "To-morrow;" but to-morrow will be too late, because it amounts to this: If the Treasurer proposes to take the Land Fund next February, then there will be a deficiency to meet; but, on the other hand, if he proposes to take it as from last June, there will be an excess. I want to know which he proposes to do, because, until he tells us his intentions upon that point, we cannot discuss the matter intelligently. The Government could not propose to the House such a scheme as this without knowing the date at which they proposed to take the Land Fund, for the whole question hinges upon that. I trust the Government will give us that information, without which it is impossible to discuss their Financial Statement with any degree of correctness.

Mr. STOUT.—I think, Sir, the Financial Statement is not a question of dates, but a question of policy, and perhaps for that reason the Financial Statement has surprised the honorable member for Egmont, who was not in the habit of propounding any policy. The particular question of policy is to be considered, and the question of dates is altogether outside and independent of that, and it does not matter in the slightest degree when the Colonial Treasurer is going to change the land law or to bring in a scheme for the classification of land. Those are details which will have to be accomplished by Bills, and it would be most unreasonable to ask the Government to enter into a lot of particulars as to what is to be contained in Bills which are to be brought down at some future time. I would like to know if the honorable member for Egmont himself when he brought down his Financial Statement would have explained such questions as he is now propounding to the present Colonial Treasurer. It is a most unheard-of thing. What would he do, if he got an answer? Why, he would be rushing about the lobbies trying to get votes during the next twenty-four hours. We have seen that done before, and I will undertake to say that he would be as active this evening and to-morrow morning as he was on a certain occasion two or three weeks ago; and he was very active then.

Mr. REID.—No doubt questions of policy are involved very largely in the Financial Statement. But, at the same time, it must be admitted that there is also a question of dates intimately connected with that of policy. We wish to know when these proposals are to take effect—when these new financial arrangements are to be made; and surely that is not an improper question to ask. We wish to know when this future policy is to take effect. There is not the least word about it in the Statement just made. We also wish to know when the new Land Bill is to be brought down. These are questions irrespective of policy; still they are so intimately connected with the question of policy that we cannot consider one without considering the other. If changes are to be made they must be made at some given date, and we ought to know when; otherwise we shall not be able to bring our discussion to any point. If the new financial arrangements are to date from June last, there will be an excess; if they are to date from a later period, there will probably be a deficiency. Everything depends upon the date on which the arrangements are to commence to take effect. I think it is very reasonable that members should have information on this point; otherwise we shall be discussing the question from one point, and then we shall be told, "You are quite wrong, because it does not take effect from the date from which you are calculating."

Sir G. GREY.—I shall not answer the question asked by the honorable member for Egmont, for obvious reasons. He asked me when the Government proposed to take the Land Fund from Canterbury: whether it was from the 30th June last.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—That was the question the honorable gentleman asked, and in asking it he attempted to mislead the House. There is no other Land Fund but that of Canterbury, and he is simply evading his responsibility when he denies having asked the question. It is a mere evasion. It happens that the honorable gentleman himself, after he was out of office virtually—the day before we were sworn in—adopted the very unusual course, a course, I believe, unprecedented on the part of Ministers only holding office nominally, of ordering the distribution of £200,000 of the Canterbury land revenue to the counties in that provincial district. He knows very well that he is guilty of an evasion. I shall not, therefore, answer his question.

Mr. GISBORNE.—Will the Government have any objection to tell us whether they intend to bring down the question of the Land Bill, or whether they merely propose to make amendments in the Land Bill?

Mr. REES.—I hope no questions will be asked or answered. The question now is, whether we shall adjourn for the purpose of considering the financial proposals of the Government; and I hope no other question will be taken into consideration at present. These matters can easily be brought in during the discussion of the Financial Statement.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am sorry to have troubled the honorable gentlemen opposite, and I hope the House will not trouble them further, because it is very evident that they have not made up their own minds on this point; but I must say that the information asked for by my honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer is reasonable: in fact, it is the starting-point from which we must approach the discussion of these financial proposals. However, as the honorable gentlemen themselves do not appear to understand their own proposals, I hope the House will not insist upon the question being answered. Let us have the Statement, and try to make something out of it to-night.

Mr. SHEEHAN.—We were told, a short time ago, that the honorable member for Egmont was to be leader of the Opposition; then we heard of the honorable member for Wellington City; and now, I suppose, we may regard the honorable member for Waikouaiti as the leader. He has always had a great reputation for finance, almost as great, although not so well deserved, as that of the honorable member for Egmont, but somehow the more speeches we hear from the honorable gentleman the less confidence we have in him. He tells us that we do not know what our proposals are. Very well, Sir, we know our own minds, and I can only advise the honorable member to use the next twenty-four hours in studying the Financial Statement and trying to make something out of it, though I very much fear that it is a little beyond him. However, when he has done that, when he has digested that Statement, let him and his friends come here, and we will give them a little more. As for ourselves, we propose that our plans shall take effect at such time as will relieve the colony of its present difficulties and place the finances in a sound condition as regards the future. It is rather remarkable to find the honorable member for Egmont, in spite of his Financial Statement, and in spite of his denial that the colony was in difficulties, coming here to-night and telling us that, unless we make the Land Fund colonial property as from last June, there will be a deficiency in the Treasury. We were not told that three months ago, for, so long as the honorable gentleman was able to take money out of the pocket of Canterbury and to mortgage the runs of Otago all was right. People have strange ideas when they are on the Government benches.

The policy which has been placed before the House I shall not fully deal with. I will not go into its details. That policy is now before the House, and honorable members will have an opportunity of fully considering it before we meet to-morrow. The honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House had better, immediately after the adjournment, start caucussing, because they will require all the time between now and the meeting of the House to-morrow to acquire a full knowledge of it. There is no twisting about us. We have not gone round the corner to obtain the votes of the people of Otago and Canterbury. We say that what our predecessors have been trying to steal we are trying to take by main force; we are respectable highwaymen, and not petty mean thieves. When honorable gentlemen have read our Statement, all, with the exception, perhaps, of a few members who are irreconcilable, will agree with us that we have risen to the occasion, and have solved a difficulty which would not otherwise have been solved for a very long time to come. We are quite satisfied with our solution of it. We are quite satisfied that honorable gentlemen can, by log-rolling and lobbying, endeavour to put us out of office on this question; but we are prepared, nevertheless, to go on with it—we are prepared even to go out of office on this question, and we are prepared, moreover, to go to the country on it. I ask the honorable gentlemen on that side of the House to go to the country on the question. I say that neither the honorable member for Egmont nor any of his party desire a dissolution. In some cases a dissolution does not mean a return to this House—it means political extinction to some honorable gentlemen; and I say that many of those honorable gentlemen who oppose our proposed land system will meet with political extinction. I may say that, if anything is left in an unsettled state in this Statement, my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer will readily explain it when we meet to-morrow. It is a most unusual thing to try to get up such a discussion as this immediately after the delivery of a Financial Statement. There will be plenty of time to get up a discussion to-morrow; and, in the meantime, we should have rest—"political rest." I have no doubt that, after honorable gentlemen have read and considered the Statement which has been made to-night, they will come down to-morrow prepared to ask questions of us which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer. I hope the House will agree to the adjournment.

Motion for adjournment agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 20th November, 1877.

Second Reading—New Plymouth Harbour Endowment—Education Reserves Bill.

SECOND READING.

NEW PLYMOUTH HARBOUR ENDOWMENT.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, Whether the Government will lay upon the table a copy of the opinion or correspondence with the Law Officers of the Crown referring to the payment of a percentage of the land revenue of Taranaki to the New Plymouth Harbour Board under "The Financial Arrangements Act, 1876"? There was at present before the Council the New Plymouth Harbour Bill, upon which a Committee was appointed to inquire into the payment of a percentage of the Land Fund of Taranaki to the New Plymouth Harbour Board. He believed a statement was made in another place that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had been taken in reference to this question, and he thought, before the Bill was considered, a copy of the opinion or correspondence should be laid on the table of the Council.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said he would be happy to give all the information he possibly could, and would now lay the correspondence and opinion on the table.

EDUCATION RESERVES BILL.

The Council proceeded to the consideration of the following reasons assigned by the House of Representatives for disagreeing to certain of the amendments made by the Legislative Council:—

"They recommend that the amendment in the first line of section 4, substituting 'one-eighth' for 'one-fourth,' be not concurred in, because one-eighth of the education reserves would be an utterly inadequate provision for the promotion of secondary education, and because, while nearly the whole charge for primary education has been thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, no contribution is made from that fund for secondary education.

"They recommend concurrence in the other amendments, except that in section 19 (as substituted for the original section) they suggest the following alterations:—

"In line 36, omit the words 'jointly agreed to.'

"In line 38, omit the word 'a.'

"In line 39, omit the words 'disapproving thereof.'

"In line 40, omit the word 'joint.'"

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE moved, That the Council should not insist upon its amendments to which the House of Representatives had disagreed, and should accept the suggested alterations in clause 19 mentioned in the message. There had been so much argument on this subject in the Council that, unless anything arose in any debate that might occur, he would not detain the Council by any further remarks.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE would make no objection to the motion. As the general principle was maintained in the Bill, it would probably be a graceful act for the Council to assent to the proposal of the other House.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES would have been

glad to hear the reasons which had led the Colonial Secretary to move, "That the Council should not insist upon its amendments." He did not know how the honorable gentleman could expect the Council to take that course. The honorable gentleman said that, seeing that the matter had been so fully debated before, he need not enter into a full explanation. Well, he (Mr. Menzies) did not know how, seeing that the matter had been fully debated before, and it having been decided in the Council, by a majority of 17 to 6, that the proportion should be one-eighth and not one-fourth, the honorable gentleman could expect the Council would reverse its decision without some good reasons being shown. After such conclusive divisions as had taken place on this subject within the last few days—one division being 17 to 5, and the following one 16 to 6—it seemed to him that, before the Council could be expected to reverse its former decision, some good cause should be shown. He had looked over the reasons assigned by the other House as they appeared on the Order Paper, and it did not seem to him that they were exactly consistent with fact. The reasons assigned were: "because one-eighth of the education reserves would be an utterly inadequate provision for the promotion of secondary education, and because, while nearly the whole charge for primary education has been thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, no contribution is made from that fund for secondary education." The last argument appeared to him to be of no value, because the 8th clause of the Education Bill, which provided for this charge, had been excised by the Council, and there really was no charge upon the Consolidated Fund for education at present. Therefore he disregarded the second reason, and said that the first reason—namely, that the proportion was utterly inadequate—was not consistent with fact. Honorable members had had a printed return placed in their hands early in the session, an Education Reserves return, on analyzing which it appeared to him that the reserves made for secondary education in Canterbury and Otago, and especially in Canterbury, were ample. He would draw the attention of the Council to the return so far as regarded Canterbury. He found that the value of the education reserves for ordinary public schools was estimated at £209,901. That was the total estimated value, but whether the estimate was correct or not he was not prepared to say. He found that there were other reserves—for classical schools, £44,765; for schools for technical science, £90,125; for a school of agriculture, £89,475; and for superior education, £55,465. Deducting the last item, and a certain proportion for classical schools, he found that the division would be—for higher school purposes, £69,965; and for collegiate purposes, £209,865. He should not himself have adopted that phraseology or that division, but he found that honorable members from Canterbury regarded the quantity he had just mentioned as applicable for collegiate purposes. He did not think that, if the terms used in this return were copied from the terms of the Trust, that would be a necessary sequence, but rather regarded the whole, or at all events a great proportion, as a provision for superior schools. Seeing, therefore, that £209,865 were reserved for collegiate purposes, £209,936 for common schools, and £69,965 for higher schools, including secondary schools, schools for superior education, and classical schools, he thought it could not be said that in Canterbury there was not ample provision for secondary education. Let them now refer to Otago. In Otago it appeared that the Crown grants were given for education generally, and that many of those reserves were set aside so that the proceeds might be applicable not to elementary schools merely, but to elementary schools, secondary schools, and universities; so that it was more difficult to draw a line in regard to this province, but he had endeavoured to do so as far as he could. His conclusion was this: The estimated value of the university reserves was £392,886; for elementary schools, £421,500; and the amount set aside for secondary schools was £100,000. In no other part of the colony, except Auckland, did he find that any reserves appeared to have been set aside for secondary schools. In Auckland he found that the value of the reserves for common schools was set down at £17,000, and the value of reserves for high schools at £24,040. Now, he thought that in the two southern provinces, in which most reserves had been made, for the reserves elsewhere were comparatively small, the provision was ample, and, if the provision was not ample in any part of the colony, the very Bill the Council now had under consideration afforded the Government power to make such reserves as might be considered necessary for the purpose. If honorable members would look at the 19th clause, passed at the instance of the Colonial Secretary, they would see—

“The Governor may from time to time, by Proclamation, provisionally reserve any waste lands of the Crown, or any lands taken under ‘The New Zealand Settlements Act, 1863,’ or any Act amending the same or construed therewith, as endowments for primary and for secondary education within the provincial district in which such lands are.”

Now, if the reserves for secondary education were held to be inadequate in any provincial district of the colony, there was ample power in that clause given to the Government to make such provision. The course the Council should take was to disagree with the amendment, which would lead to some other messages, and possibly to a Conference. He did not wish to move an amendment to the motion of the Colonial Secretary, because he found from experience of late that, although the Council might decide by considerable majorities in one direction in one week, yet changes of opinion occurred—the wind changed, a “southerly bu’ster” set in—and so it came to pass that what was at one time a popular idea might in the course of a very few days come to be considered as an idea that ought to be kicked under the table. The other amendments referred to in the message were of an unimportant character. With reference to the 4th clause, he should ask for a division, without moving an amendment, and, in case the majority of the Council still adhered to the view it expressed the other day, he would be prepared to take some further action.

The Hon. Mr. HALL very sincerely trusted that the Council would agree to the proposal of the Colonial Secretary. He heard with some surprise [the remarks which had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Menzies, who, as a general rule, used very fair arguments; but in this case the effect of the honorable gentleman's remarks had been to mislead the Council as to the actual facts of the case with regard to the Province of Canterbury. The question was, whether the amendment made the other day by the Council would leave to that province a reasonable provision for the maintenance of secondary education—in other words, for the establishment of high schools. The honorable gentleman had enumerated several large reserves mentioned in the list he had referred to, and led the Council to believe that, independently of the reserves for general educational purposes, there were these large reserves applicable for secondary education. Now, he assured the Council that that was not the case—that those reserves for a classical school, for a school of technical science, for a school of agriculture, and for superior education were, by the terms of the trust, not applicable to high schools; and the Board of Governors of the Canterbury College, in whom they were vested, had been anxious to take steps towards establishing a boys' high school in Christchurch, and found, on referring to the terms of the trusts, that those reserves were not applicable to the purpose. He was in hopes that the reserve of 8,000 acres for a classical school would have been available, but on looking closely at the terms of the trust it was considered not to be applicable. The only resource, therefore, was to apply to the Government for some endowment which would enable them to establish a high school, the want of which was much felt. He trusted the Council would accept that statement as opposed to the statement of the Hon. Mr. Menzies, and would realize the fact that all that would be left out of the Canterbury reserves for the establishment of secondary education, both in the northern part of Canterbury and in the southern part, would be one-eighth of the reserves which were now left for general education. These amounted to 59,000 acres. They were let for £6,400, being an average of from 4s. to 5s. an acre, and they were let generally for periods varying from seven to fourteen years. He thought those figures would satisfy honorable members that no very large increase of income was likely to accrue from those reserves at an early date. It was not a case like those of which they were told the other day, where property which now produced £1,000 would soon produce £10,000, or anything of that kind. This was agricultural land which was already let at prices varying from 4s. to 5s. an acre. It was possible that some additional rent might be received, but it could not be very soon. Therefore, if honorable members wished to afford reasonable facilities for the establishment of a boys' high school at Christchurch and at Timaru, he asked them whether they thought it right to cut down the income placed at their disposal from £1,600 to £800. The other reserves, as he had said before, were applicable to the purposes of a school of agriculture, and to those purposes which, in Otago, were perhaps better distinguished by being called university purposes. Under those circumstances he trusted the Council would, upon reconsideration, not insist upon its amendments. He did not think it was sufficient ground for adopting the opposite course to say that, because they had voted in one direction one day, they must absolutely adhere to that vote. There was one other point to which he wished to refer. He wished to remind honorable gentlemen from the North, who, he thought, under all the circumstances of the present time, especially considering recent financial announcements, seemed disposed to deal rather hardly with the South, that, of the reserves for general educational purposes in Otago and Canterbury which had been set aside out of the lands of those provinces, three-fourths were about to be surrendered to the colony. Honorable gentlemen should bear these considerations in mind when they were endeavouring to arrive at compromises. When they were talking of giving and taking, it should not be all taking: there should be a little giving. He might mention that this one-fourth was a compromise made between gentlemen representing Otago and Canterbury and the late Government. In pursuance of that arrangement the Bill as it stood when it came into the Council was introduced into Parliament by the late Government, was carried through the other House by the late Government, and introduced into the Council by the late Colonial Secretary. The Hon. Dr. Pollen said he did not introduce it: at any rate, it was framed by the Government of which the honorable gentleman was a member, and was introduced by them into the other branch of the Legislature. He could not therefore attempt to deny his responsibility for it, and he (Mr. Hall) could not for one moment suppose that the honorable gentleman would attempt to upset the work of his colleagues. He trusted that, for these reasons, the Council would agree to the motion proposed by the Colonial Secretary.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT was sorry to say that he could not agree with any part of the speech of the Hon. Mr. Hall. He would ask the honorable gentleman, taking the whole of the different charitable schools, which these schools were, what was the percentage of children that would be sent to the secondary schools? He did not suppose there would be 10 per cent., while the honorable gentleman asked for one-fourth of the whole of the money. He (Colonel Brett) should say that one-tenth would be quite sufficient, or even one-twentieth. There were only five or six boys out of every hundred in the colony adapted for secondary education. His honorable friend would pauperize the whole country. They did not want this pauperizing of the country. The people objected to it, and particularly in his (Colonel Brett's) district, which was a very poor district. When he spoke of this charitable school in the district the people rose up with anger, and said they would not send their children to a charitable school. All the schools throughout the country were charitable schools, and the people did not like it. They were willing to pay their share for the education of their children, just as much as the higher classes were. As it had been settled that they were to have State education, he did not see why they should go beyond the elementary schools. What was the case at Home? The most eminent men in Parliament, including Mr. Disraeli, said that it was only necessary to educate the people in the three "Rs." He was very much against this waste of money—this profligate expenditure on education. It was nothing more nor less than that, and he condemned it very much, and would oppose the present motion. He was very sorry to have to do so, because he believed the honorable gentleman was moving in the matter conscientiously. Nevertheless, he trusted that the Council would not agree to the motion.

The Hon. Mr. ROBINSON said that, whenever anything came up about schools, even about the Boys' College at Christchurch, the Hon. Colonel Brett always seemed to enunciate very imaginative ideas, or else the schools in his neighbourhood were very different from those in other parts of the country. His honorable friend must himself have been educated in a very strange school. He told them that he did not think more than 10 per cent. of the boys would attend these secondary schools, and that, consequently, a tenth or a fifteenth of the funds derived from these reserves would be a fair proportion to be given for the purpose. But the honorable gentleman forgot altogether that the primary schools were subsidized from the Consolidated Fund, and that only a portion of the reserves were given towards defraying the cost of secondary education, so that, if he wanted the money fairly divided, he would find that a tenth of the reserves would not be anything like a fair proportion, even if only 10 per cent. of boys attended the secondary schools. He thought the honorable and gallant gentleman had been labouring under a misapprehension in this respect. He laid very great stress upon his assertion that the people would be pauperized, and said that the people in his neighbourhood had a particular objection to being pauperized. No doubt they had; there was nothing very strange in that. He (Mr. Robinson) did not know that any class of people in any part of the colony would like to be pauperized, and particularly in the sense in which the honorable gentleman put it. But he did not look upon this as anything in the shape of eleemosynary aid towards the schools. There had been a certain quantity of land set aside, the income from which was to be appropriated towards the expense of education. Three-fourths of the reserves had been given up to the Government, and surely the remaining fourth was not too much to ask for on behalf of secondary education. He had no doubt there were many lads in the neighbourhood in which his honorable friend lived—say, 10 per cent—who would take advantage of these schools, and who it was desirable should receive better education than the rest. That was not too much to ask for under the circumstances. With regard to what fell from the Hon. Mr. Menzies as to the opinion of the Council changing very much, he (Mr. Robinson) for one was willing to admit that he was not so obstinate that, once having said a thing, and having reconsidered the matter and found that he was labouring under a wrong impression, he would still adhere to his first opinion. He was not like the witness in a case of horse-stealing, who first deposed that the horse was 16 feet high, but, on cross-examination, said 16 hands high; and, on being reminded of his former statement, said, "Well, if I said 16 feet, I will stick to it."

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMSON thought the country had undertaken a very great work, and that in the present state of their finances it would be quite enough for them to do to provide what was required for primary education. He did not think the country, in the present state of its finances, was able to afford secondary education. He would like to see a list of the names of the parents of those boys who frequented the secondary schools. He thought it would be found that in nine-tenths of the cases the parents of the boys attending these schools were well able to provide such education at their own expense.

The Hon. Mr. PATERSON said he altogether objected to the doctrine propounded by the Hon. Mr. Williamson, that secondary education should only be provided for those who were able to pay for it. It was very well known that in all times, past and present, many of the most eminent men in science and literature had risen from the ranks of the working classes, who, as a rule, were not able to obtain secondary education for their children. Why should they be shut out from the benefits which the State was perfectly well able to provide for them? He thought it was monstrous that the children of poor people, if possessed of talent and ability, should be excluded from higher education and prevented from raising themselves in the social scale, simply because their parents happened to be unable to provide that education for them. He would support the proposal to set apart one-fourth of the whole fund for secondary schools.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER wished that the Hon. Mr. Williamson could see a list of those parents who did not know where to get secondary education for their children. He thought that such a list would induce him to hold very different views from those which he had expressed. It was all very well for those honorable gentlemen who could send their children to Europe for secondary education to take up such a line of argument, but there were very few persons in the colony who were so situated. Whilst agreeing with the Hon. Mr. Paterson in what he had said, he held that it was clearly the duty of the State to furnish some opportunities for boys of superior ability to prosecute studies which they had commenced in the elementary schools and make themselves capable of becoming illustrious men, celebrated for their learning, or, at any rate, of becoming more useful citizens; and he would say that there was a great middle-class in this country who were just as much interested in this matter as those who were pleased to call the people. There was a need in all classes for these schools, and he thought the Council had done extremely little justice to the efforts of a very large portion of the Colony of New Zealand which had been for the last sixteen or seventeen years endeavouring to promote and set on foot a school having for its object this branch of education. Whether those efforts had been attended with success or not was not altogether the question for them to consider at the present time. Boys of great ability had been turned out by that school, and in the early days of its history it was very successful. He thought the Council had not sufficiently reflected upon this subject. To destroy with one vote the efforts of persons who had been so sincerely interested in the cause of education spoke very little for the interest which the Legislative Council took in this matter. Two or three more votes such as had been given in reference to this question would cause him to exclaim, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Provincialist." It was a most lamentable thing that, just when they had got the Government of the colony into the hands of one Parliament, they seemed to ignore all the efforts of Provincial Governments that had been going on for so many years, and to cast them aside as if they were utterly valueless and of no account.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE believed it was a generally-expressed opinion in the Council that this was a subject which might very properly be reconsidered. Honorable gentlemen had come to the conclusion that they were rather hasty in passing the resolution they did. The proposal was made by gentlemen from the southern part of the colony, and it appeared such a generous gift that some honorable gentlemen accepted it at once, and thought it would be churlish not to accept what was so liberally offered. For his part, he did not conceal from himself or from the Council that it was a breach of an honorable understanding come to in another place between representatives of the people from various parts of the country.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES could not understand why the honorable gentleman should say that the action of the Council was a breach of an understanding in another place. Was the honorable gentleman in order in saying so?

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that appeared to him to be rather a hair-splitting objection. He referred of course to the view which would be taken by the public rather than as between the two Houses. He was quite willing to admit that their action was quite independent of the other branch of the Legislature, and that they were neither influenced nor controlled by its views or arrangements. But, after all, the settlers throughout the country were most interested in the matter, and they would say that the people of the South, who made those large reserves, were called upon to make a great sacrifice when they gave up three-fourths of the endowments which they calculated upon. He thought the proposal embodied in this Bill was a liberal one, and he admired the spirit in which the sacrifice was made without any complaint whatever. Therefore he voted against the proposal to reduce the proportion to one-eighth, although he came from a part of the country which had everything to gain and nothing to lose by it; moreover, he urged honorable gentlemen who would likewise be gainers to take the same course. Now the argument seemed to have assumed a wider importance, and there was a little of the class element introduced which had not appeared before. He deprecated that line of argument altogether. In his opinion there were no rich and no poor who had any right to receive special consideration from the Legislature. All were equally entitled to their care, and the son of the poorest peasant had an equal right to have access to secondary education with the child of the richest and most successful colonist amongst them. They were all working men, although some of them had been more fortunate than others. The House of Representatives had been singularly civil to the Council this year. He thought this was the first amendment of theirs which had been disagreed with out of a great many; and, in doing so, the House of Representatives simply said—what all of them who had given any attention to the subject knew—that to diminish the proportion in one or two provinces most concerned would practically destroy the secondary education of that part of the country. For his part, he would act consistently in the vote he was about to give; but he did not think that honorable gentlemen who changed their minds on that subject acted inconsistently, because he did not think it had been made so clear to them as it now was by the Hon. Mr. Hall that the alteration would dry up the resources of the Province of Canterbury for secondary education. He hoped the motion he had made would be agreed to.

Question put, "That the Council doth not insist upon its amendments in the 4th section of the Education Reserves Bill;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

First Readings—Second Readings—Westport and Greymouth Coal Fields—Motueka Roads—K. Karetai—Canterbury Surveys—School of Mines—W. H. Tai-pari—Canterbury Railway Reserves—Financial Statement.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Taranaki Smelting Works Bill, Jackson's Bay Road District Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Native Lands Bill, Marine Bill, Cemeteries Management Bill.

WESTPORT AND GREYMOUTH COAL FIELDS.

Mr. KENNEDY asked the Government, Whether they will appoint a Royal Commission to ascertain, during the recess, the progress being made towards developing the coal fields at Westport and Greymouth; the quantity and quality of coal each mine in operation is capable of producing weekly; the prospects of such coal being brought into successful competition with imported coal throughout the colony, and the most effectual and immediate means of accomplishing that object; and, if so, if the report of such Commission will be laid before this House next session? It was generally agreed that this was one of the most important industries in the colony, and that it to a very large extent depended for its development upon shareholders scattered throughout the colony, who had no means of obtaining proper information as to the prospects of their investments. He trusted the Government would see the necessity of appointing a Commission, and that they would appoint to it gentlemen who were not heads of departments merely, but gentlemen who were acquainted with the subject, and who were capable of forming an opinion on the matter which they would have to investigate.

Mr. MACANDREW replied that the Government fully recognized the importance of this matter, and intended to appoint a Commission during the recess. He trusted that the result of their labours would be satisfactory.

MOTUEKA ROADS.

Mr. HURSTHOUSE asked the Minister for Public Works, If the Government will make provision for reinstating the roads in the Motueka District (destroyed by floods in February last) by placing on the Supplementary Estimates a sum, in addition to that already granted, which will enable the Board to carry out the recommendations contained in a report by Mr. G. Blackett? In asking this question he might be allowed to make one or two remarks with regard to the subject to which it referred. It would no doubt be in the remembrance of the House that in February last disastrous floods had occurred in the district which he represented. A great deal of damage had been done to private property, and also to the main roads in the district. The matter was then represented to the Government by himself and the Executive officer, Mr. Curtis; and, on the recommendation of Mr. Curtis, the Government consented to allow the sum of £2,700 (taken from the vote of last year of £30,000 for the road from Westport to Nelson) to be spent in reinstating the damaged roads. Before that was done, the Government sent Mr. Blackett to the district to make a full report on the subject, which was referred to the Government. In that report two plans were recommended. It was stated that the road could be reinstated at a certain cost, provided it was taken along the banks of the river, where the greatest damage was done. This, Mr. Blackett stated, would not be advisable, as the road then would be subject to floods, but that a safe road could be made under the hills at a cost of £1,433 greater than that by the river-bank. The Government only consented to place at the Board's disposal the sum required to do the least expensive work recommended in the report, but the Board was very unwilling to spend that money on a work which they knew would be unsatisfactory to the general ratepayers. On his arrival in Wellington he communicated these facts to the then Minister for Public Works (Mr. Ormond), who agreed with him as to the extra sum that would be required. In order to substantiate what he had stated, he would read an extract from a letter which he had received from the Secretary of the Motueka Highway Board, in which he said,—

"We have had a letter from the Under Secretary for Public Works, stating that, from the statements made by yourself and Mr. Baigent, the Minister is convinced that it is desirable the more expensive road shown in Blackett's report should be made, and that Parliament would be recommended to vote a sufficient amount for the purpose, which I hope Parliament will be generous enough to do, for, if the Valley is to have a road at all, it is no use making it anywhere except out of the reach of floods. Blackett estimated the cost of the more expensive or hill road at £1,433 6s. more than the road on the river-bank, but I feel sure that he is at least £200 below the mark. The difference in the amount granted by Government on Blackett's estimate of the hill road with 10 per cent. added is £1,855 6s., and I am quite sure that every farthing will be required."

The letter then entered into details. The object in putting the question was to ascertain if the present Government would carry out the promise made by the late Government, and place the sum named by the Under Secretary for Public Works on the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose stated. He trusted he should receive a satisfactory answer to the question, inasmuch as the matter was one of considerable importance to the people of the district.

Mr. LARNACH replied that, in addition to the sum which had already been placed on the Estimates, the Government would place on the Supplementary Estimates a sum of £2,800, which would be given to the two Boards. The sum of £1,423 would be given to the Waimea Board, and the remaining £1,377 to the Motueka Board.

K. KARETAI.

Mr. TAIAROA asked the Minister for Native Affairs, What action the Government intend to take with reference to the report of the Native Affairs Committee on the petition of Korako Karetai? The Native Affairs Committee had given a certain decision in this case, and he wished to know what action the Government were going to take in order to carry out the report of the Committee.

Mr. SHEEHAN replied that the Government intended to place the sum of £50 on the Supplementary Estimates, as recommended by the Committee.

CANTERBURY SURVEYS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked the Minister for Lands, If he will state what increase, if any, has been made in the number of surveyors employed by Government in the Provincial District of Canterbury since the 13th September last, and the total number at present employed; also, if he will inform the House at what date the Chief Surveyor expects to complete the survey of the land already purchased from the Crown in that district, and not yet surveyed? He wished to give one or two reasons for asking this question. Upon the 13th December last, the then Minister for Lands (Mr. Reid) explained that 576,000 acres of land which had been purchased were then unsurveyed. He (Mr. Montgomery) was aware that there were many people who were unable to go upon their land because it was not surveyed. He was also aware that some parties had erected buildings and commenced fencing, and, after the land had been surveyed privately, it was discovered that the houses were not upon their sections. There were people who had purchased land four or five years ago, and who were not able to go upon it to the present time. It seemed to him that the number of surveyors employed were quite inadequate to overtake the large arrears of work. With the staff now employed, a number of years would elapse before the surveys could be completed. He wished to ask the Hon. the Minister for Lands whether any addition had been made to the staff, and whether the Chief Surveyor of the district could hold out any reasonable hopes as to when the land already sold would be surveyed, so that the people could depend upon getting on their sections and making use of them. With that explanation, he begged to ask the question standing in his name.

Mr. MACANDREW replied that since the 13th September there had been seven fresh appointments to the Canterbury survey staff. At present there were twenty-seven surveyors employed, exclusive of the Chief Surveyor, the Inspector of Surveys, and three others engaged in mapping. The Chief Surveyor stated that it would take two years before the surveys were completed. There were at present 720,000 acres of land to be surveyed. He might further state that the Government were desirous of obtaining more surveyors as soon as they could obtain them, about which, however, there was rather a difficulty.

SCHOOL OF MINES.

Mr. BARFF asked, If the Government intend to institute any further inquiries in connection with the proposed establishment of a School of Mines?

Mr. MACANDREW, in the absence of the Premier, might say that some correspondence took place between the late Government and the University Council of Otago with regard to the establishment of a School of Mines in that part of the colony. That correspondence ended in negotiations being entered into with certain persons in Victoria who were specially qualified in regard to this matter. He was not aware what the present state of those negotiations was, but hoped that before the House separated he would be able to give the result.

W. H. TAIPARI.

Mr. TAIAROA asked the Native Minister, What action the Government intend to take in reference to the report of the Native Affairs Committee on the petition of W. H. Taipari? The reason for his asking this question was that Taipari had sent in a petition to the House for a reward for the discovery of a gold field at the Thames. The Committee went into the question and came to a decision, and he wished to know what action the Government intended to take with reference to the report of the Committee.

Mr. SHEEHAN replied that the petition referred to was a revival of a claim made by Taipari for a reward to which he said he was entitled for the discovery of a gold field at the Thames. The Committee recommended that the matter should be referred to the favourable consideration of the Government, and he gathered from the papers left by his predecessors that they adopted the report and would settle the claim. The present Government would endeavour to settle the claim as fairly as they could.

CANTERBURY RAILWAY RESERVES.

Mr. WAKEFIELD asked the Government, Whether they intend to take power to subdivide and dispose of the railway reserves in South Canterbury? He might say that before the abolition of the provinces there was a distinct promise given by the Superintendent of Canterbury that these reserves should be subdivided and sold in such a manner as to prevent their falling into the hands of large-speculators. One reason for his putting the question was to know whether the Government would apply the system of deferred payments to these reserves, which were large tracts of valuable land situated near the railways, and suitable for the location of artisans who were employed on the railways.

Mr. MACANDREW was very glad the honorable gentleman had placed this question on the Order Paper, because the attention of the Government had not previously been drawn to the matter. The Government would inquire into the exact state of these reserves, and, with regard to those which were not absolutely required for special purposes, steps would be taken to have them placed in the market.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Mr. LARNACH said,—I may mention, with reference to that part of the Financial Statement which deals with the Land Fund, that the Government propose to take the Land Fund as from the 1st January.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I have thought lately that I was to blame for not having availed myself of some of the many opportunities that have presented themselves during the past month to answer the very inaccurate statements with regard to finance which have emanated from the Treasury benches, and which have been very carefully circulated by the partisans of the Government throughout the country. But I now think that the course I followed was a wise one, because we have at last had placed before us a well-considered statement from the Treasurer, showing the financial position of the colony and the proposals of the Government: I am therefore now in a better position to avail myself of the present opportunity to give a brief history of the finances relative to public works for the last few years, and also to comment upon the proposals which the Treasurer submitted for our consideration last night. Sir, it has been said, and said repeatedly, in this House that the late Government was a continuous Government from 1869. I hardly know what meaning the honorable gentlemen who take that view attach to the word "continuous." No one has given us the meaning he attaches to the word. They have one and all contented themselves with the assertion that such was the fact. I should like to ask, In what was the Government continuous? Was it continuous in its personnel? We know that it was not. The Premier, and every other member of the Government, has been changed several times. Was it continuous in its policy? Certainly not. The policy was changed more than once. Was it in finance? Certainly not; the whole system of finance was also changed. Then in what respect was it a continuous Government? Sir, this is a question which appears to me to be one of not very great importance, except from the importance which has been attached to it by the other side, and because I think that by accepting such a doctrine we very much weaken the responsibility of individual Ministers. This becomes evident when I am told by honorable gentlemen opposite that I am responsible for the acts committed by my honorable friend the member for Wanganui in 1870, when I was not a member of this House, and, in fact, was visiting England. Is it to be said that, because I joined the Government in 1874, I am responsible for the acts which my honorable friend committed in 1870? If I am to be held responsible for those acts as though I had been a party to them, then it is clear that by so much shall I attach less importance to the acts I myself committed last year and the year before. I hold that a Minister is only responsible for the acts he himself commits, or for those the responsibility of which he takes upon himself. But let us, for the sake of argument, admit that it was a continuous Government, and see what we shall arrive at. Suppose it was a continuous Government, the fact is then evident, there were two very distinct epochs in its history. Up to 1874 it was a Government carried on by the Provincial party, a party which favoured the provinces; it was supported by gentlemen who believed strongly in the desirability of maintaining provincial institutions. After that date, the party which took the Government, and has remained in power since, was a party which believed in the abolition of the provinces, and which succeeded in doing away with them. We shall also find a marked distinction in the mode of conducting the finance since 1875. After the year 1870, and up to the beginning of the financial year 1875-76, we had been in the habit of appropriating our public works loans by permanent appropriations. When we borrowed money we set apart large sums for railways and other services, and placed them within the power of the Government for expenditure, not from year to year, but extending over several years. Very great and perhaps necessary power was placed in the hands of the Government up to 1875, but after that time that system was entirely altered. I myself had then the honor of occupying the position of Colonial Treasurer. In that year we did away with all standing appropriations: we thereby placed within the control of the House the whole of the money raised by loan from year to year, and we introduced for the first time the Immigration and Public Works Loan Appropriation Act. The power of reserving votes chargeable upon the Consolidated Fund was done away with, and every vote made to expire absolutely on the 30th June in each year. In 1875 we also submitted to the House a plan for extending the expenditure of the balance of the public works loans over a period of two years, and, as I have before shown, the plan then laid down was faithfully adhered to; and on the 30th June last we had not expended the whole of the balance of the loans which were authorized in 1875. Therefore, Sir, if we were a continuous Government, we, at any rate, can claim the credit of having—as soon as what I may term the glitter of the Public Works scheme had worn off—settled down to our work, and seriously looked forward to the years to come. Since that date, we have steadily adhered, under much pressure, to the plans we then marked out for ourselves with the approval of the House. It will be necessary, Sir, that I should call your attention to the state of the colony in 1870, when the scheme of Immigration and Public Works was first introduced. It is well known to you that we had been suffering many years of depression; that property throughout the colony was almost valueless, and unsaleable; that very little employment was to be got; and that many people were seriously thinking of leaving the colony. The population of New Zealand at that time was, in round numbers, 250,000. The public debt, less the accrued Sinking Fund, was £7,250,000 including £618,000 Treasury bills, of which some were issued in that year to make up the deficit of the previous year. The annual charge on our public debt was £536,000. Our consolidated revenue was only £936,000, and our Land Fund for the year was £208,000. Our total revenue, land and consolidated, together, was, in round numbers, £1,150,000. At the end of the financial year just expired our population had risen to 400,000. Our public debt had increased from £7,250,000 to £18,250,000—that is, after deducting the accrued Sinking Fund £1,353,000, and the cash in hand on the 30th June £980,000, the gross debt being £20,618,000; and the permanent charges had risen to £1,180,000. Our consolidated revenue had risen to £1,951,000, our Land Fund to £1,035,000, giving a total revenue of £3,000,000. The Treasury bills now outstanding amount to £837,000, being an increase in the seven years of £214,000. The charge on the permanent debt in 1870 consumed four-sevenths of our consolidated revenue. In the year just ended, seventwelfths of our ordinary revenue was required to meet the same charge. That is to say, the extra charge in proportion to the revenue had risen one eighty-fourth—a very small rise indeed. But this fact is also worthy of note: that in 1870 one-half our revenue—territorial and consolidated—was taken to pay permanent charges, whereas in the present year only one-third of our combined revenue is required for that purpose. I have said that the debt in 1870 was £7,250,000, and that this year it is £18,250,000—that is to say, an increase of £11,000,000. That sum of £11,000,000 is the amount we have expended on immigration and public works, land purchase, and two or three other smaller items which I need not particularize. That is the amount we have expended on these things during the last seven years: we have not spent £27,000,000, as the Hon. the Premier was pleased to tell the House the other night we had done. Of this sum of £11,000,000, £500,000 was consumed by the expenses of raising the loans, and in discount, £1,250,000 was spent on immigration, and about £1,750,000 upon railway material in England. That would leave a balance of about £7,500,000 which has been expended on public works throughout the colony. That would be a little more than £1,000,000 a year, and not, as has been stated by some honorable gentlemen, £3,000,000 a year. Now, Sir, for this expenditure we have certainly obtained 100,000 immigrants; we have also completed 860 miles of railway; we have made 2,300 miles of roads; and we have extended the telegraph 8,260 miles. We have also land worth, in my opinion, at least £750,000; and, in addition to that, we have all our public buildings, our lighthouses, and our waterworks upon our gold fields. If any one will look fairly at the expenditure, and at the circumstances under which it was made, I think he will be inclined to say—although it is possible we have wasted money, necessarily wasted money, owing to the rapid manner in which the scheme has been carried out, for which the late Government are certainly not wholly responsible—still we have got good value for our money. At any rate, that is my opinion; and I think we should rather congratulate ourselves upon what we have got than waste regrets over what might have been. And here, Sir, I might remark that, since I had the honor of taking office some three years ago, we have only taken power to increase the indebtedness of the colony to the extent of £1,350,000. That is the whole of the borrowing power which I have asked and obtained since I have been in the Government. And on the 30th June last there was one million of that amount in cash in the Treasury.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Does that include Treasury bills?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes. When I speak of our indebtedness, I invariably include Treasury bills and cash advances on bonds. I have said that we have increased the amount of Treasury bills since 1870 to the extent of £214,000. But, to my mind, that is not a matter for surprise at all. I take an entirely different view on that point from that held by the honorable gentlemen opposite, who seem to think there is something dreadful in the idea of issuing Treasury bills. To my mind there is no difference whatever between Treasury bills and any other bond, so far as the public debt is concerned. Treasury bills, or long-dated debentures, are simply matters of convenience. The question is, Which is the most profitable way of raising money to meet our requirements? Well, we have increased Treasury bills since 1870 by the sum of £214,000. But when I say that we have assisted Auckland, Wellington, and Westland to the extent of over £300,000 within the last three years, it will not be a matter of surprise that so small an increase as that has occurred. I would ask those honorable gentlemen who talk so much about the employment of Treasury bills what they would have done under such circumstances. Would it have been wise at that time to have taken up a permanent loan for the purpose of meeting this expenditure? If any Minister had made such a proposal, he would have been laughed at.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Major ATKINSON.—That is my opinion. Looking at the position of the colony, it was right to see if the consolidated revenue could not bear the charge; and therefore it was then a prudent transaction to issue Treasury bills, instead of issuing a permanent loan, so as to enable us to see whether the consolidated revenue would not increase sufficiently, as was reasonable to hope, to repay these bills. It may be said that there were other ways of meeting this charge. We might have proposed to seize, as my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer is now doing, the Land Fund of Canterbury; but I think neither he nor anybody else will say that that would have been possible at that time. There was another course. We might have increased taxation for the purpose, but I will ask whether the House or the country would have listened to such a proposal. It is perfectly clear that neither of these courses was practicable, and the only choice open to the Government was to issue Treasury bills or a long-dated loan, and we considered the former the more reasonable course. Sir, I hold in my hands a very interesting statement which, when it is placed before the House and the country, will be perused, I venture to think, with great satisfaction. It is a statement which I had prepared shortly before I left office, showing the actual receipts of the colony on the one side, treating the provinces and the colony as one, and the actual expenses on the other, eliminating all cross entries and transfers, and showing separately all aids to revenue in the shape of Treasury bills, advances out of loan, or released Sinking Fund, and also the expenditure upon public works of every description, including the subsidies to Road Boards, River Boards, harbour works, &c. And this is what we find: that the total receipts for the year amounted to £3,393,884 14s. 2d.; the total expenditure, exclusive, as I have said, of all subsidies and public works, to £2,779,318 5s. 3d.; which shows that after providing for all actual and necessary expenditure of Government, including interest and permanent charges, there was a surplus balance to credit of £514,000 available for local public works. The aids to revenue, as will be seen upon reference to the table, amounted to £673,174 9s. 11d., and we began the year with a balance in hand of £431,611 8s. 11d., making a total available for local expenditure of £1,619,352 6s. 11d., and there was during the year locally expended £1,284,658 15s.

The facts disclosed by this table are, to my mind, very significant. They show, beyond dispute, that the revenue of the colony is ample to meet all its liabilities; they also show the absolute necessity there was for the abolition of the provinces, and for the whole of the expenditure being brought under the control and responsibility of this House. The country, no doubt, thinks that our expenditure last year upon public works was the amount spent out of loan voted by this House—namely, £1,500,000—whereas, in truth, we expended last year nearly £3,000,000. It is perfectly clear that this colony is not justified in such an expenditure, and it is clear that this expenditure ought to come under the review of this House. This account also brings out another very satisfactory fact, as I think, although I am in absolute conflict with the Premier on this point, because he told us the other day that we proposed to increase the expenditure this year, and persisted in that statement. I am going to compare the statement I have just made with the proposals for expenditure which were submitted to the House when I was Colonial Treasurer—proposals which, I understand, have been accepted by the present Colonial Treasurer. Perhaps honorable gentlemen will not be able to follow me very clearly, but I will give the references, so that they can compare this statement with the Financial Statement, and see that the deductions I draw are absolutely correct. On page 9 of my Financial Statement it will be found that the total expenditure out of the consolidated revenue is set down at £2,393,000. In order to compare that with this account, we must deduct subsidies, £130,000; which leaves £2,265,000. To this we must add the cost of interest, surveys, &c., which is charged against Land Fund, £561,000, and we find the total expenditure to be £2,826,000. Upon reference to this account, which I hope will be laid upon the table by the Government, it will be seen that the total actual expenditure of last year was £2,879,000. To this must be added £30,000 paid out of loan in aid of the Constabulary, making a total expenditure of £2,909,000. If from this we take the proposed expenditure this year, we shall find that there is a balance to credit of £83,000. That is to say, our proposal is to spend £83,000 less than was actually expended last year. But that is not all, for, to compare the account fairly, you must take from the proposed expenditure this year £117,000, being the extra amount we have to pay for interest on money borrowed. You must also take out £51,000, the additional amount over last year's expenditure on account of the extension of railways, so that, if the accounts are fairly compared, it will be found that under the proposals this year there will be a saving of £250,000 upon the actual expenditure of last year. Now, Sir, that, to my mind, is a most satisfactory state of things. It shows clearly the justification there was for the abolition of the provinces; it shows that the Government were carefully considering the whole position, and that the reduction which we promised was actually made. I call upon any honorable gentleman who doubts these figures—I call upon the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer, in his reply—to prove that anything I have advanced is in any way incorrect. Sir, I now come to the present, and to what we proposed to do in the future. I shall presently examine the statement of the honorable gentleman, and his propositions. I am first going to examine the difficulties which he said he had discovered: I observe, however, with satisfaction, that, as he becomes better acquainted—and his acquaintance is yet but elementary—with the accounts of the colony, the difficulties he saw seem to have entirely disappeared. The honorable member when he first took office raised a question as to the possibility of meeting our liabilities owing to the want of cash. What has become of that difficulty? The honorable gentleman told us that he had to make bricks without straw. Has he succeeded in doing so? If he has, he ought to tell this House, because it is a secret which I, for my own part, would very much like to know, in order that I may take advantage of it should I ever again become Treasurer. As to the question of cash, if the honorable gentleman had considered the matter at all, and if he had really known the position of the accounts of the colony, the question of the want of cash to meet accruing liabilities would never have arisen, because we had made ample provision by arrangement with the Bank of New Zealand to advance more cash than the honorable gentleman can require; and the honorable gentleman, I presume, is well aware of that now. We had made ample provision, supposing the consolidated revenue fell short at any time, to meet all difficulties of that sort. Then, in regard to the provision to be made for this year, the honorable gentleman raised a great question. He did not know how—to use a homely term—both ends were to be made to meet. Well, he has accepted the whole of my figures relating to revenue, expenditure, and loans; he has told us that they are all satisfactory—that, to quote his own words, “I will at once admit, Sir, that it would be impossible for me to attempt to place more clearly before the House than the late Hon. the Colonial Treasurer has done all details in reference to the different loans which this colony has from time to time contracted;” and, by implication, this acceptance applies also to my treatment of revenue and expenditure. I have, therefore, only to refer him to my Financial Statement, where he will find how to balance the accounts for the present year, and I commend it to his further consideration. I now come to the question of how we were going to deal with our floating liabilities. How did we propose to meet the Treasury bills and deal with the one million which we had borrowed from the bank? We intended to provide permanently for these floating liabilities under the Inscription of Stock Bill. The Inscription of Stock Bill would have met that difficulty in the most satisfactory and complete way. We had hoped to have obtained that Bill last session—we thought the Imperial Parliament would have passed an Act, and that we should have got a Bill through this Assembly; but we failed. Had the Bill passed last session, this question of the floating debt would already have become a thing of the past; and I say that our proposition compares most favourably with the proposition of the honorable gentleman, which will necessitate a double transaction. As I have shown, we had made proper provision for cash payments, we had marked out a course by which we could fund the floating debt—always supposing that this House had approved of it—and we had provided a reasonable finance for the present year. We had also—I am only going to touch upon this here, because I shall deal with it fully hereafter—made ample provision for the whole of the outstanding provincial liabilities. It is not a fact, and the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer must unquestionably know this now if he did not know it when he made his Statement, that there is a liability of £200,000 which we did not provide for. Presently I will go into the exact figures when I come to examine the honorable gentleman's Statement, and then the House can judge between him and me. It will be seen that our whole financial position had been carefully thought out; that we were following a well-devised plan; that we saw clearly how we were going to meet all our liabilities; and that we had made reasonable and wise provision to overcome all the difficulties which the honorable gentleman thinks or thought so formidable. Every fact and figure which I have given to-night can be verified or contradicted from published records easily accessible. We have had it from the Premier himself that he has now clearly and certainly ascertained the financial position of the colony. This we were told three weeks ago, and we had it last night from the Colonial Treasurer that he could not even hope to put before the House more clearly than I have done all the details of the loans which we have raised from time to time. I would point out that that covers a very great deal: it covers not only the borrowing, but the expending, and the liabilities as they now stand. What, then, becomes of the gross charges preferred against the late Government by the Hon. the Premier? They have all vanished: not one is even attempted to be substantiated. Upon that statement I am quite prepared that the country should judge between myself and the honorable gentleman. But, Sir, as we are to be judged by our past doings, I should like to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House and the country to the state in which the Hon. the Premier left the country after some five or six years of almost absolute administration as Governor. Sir, I am going to call quite an impartial witness; I am going to read to you an extract from an address of this House to the then Governor. The time was when the House was trying to obtain responsible government, and the country will be able to judge between the promises which the honorable gentleman now makes and the performances which are therein recorded. This extract is from a paper laid before the English House of Commons. It is signed by our late Speaker, Sir Charles Clifford, and is enclosed in a despatch of the Acting-Governor Wynyard: it is dated August, 1854. As I said before, the country is going to judge us upon our past acts. Now, the honorable gentleman the Premier has come forward as a great financier. He has told us that he was familiar with the accounts of the colony when I was in the cradle or in my early youth. He is set up as a great authority on these matters, as a man who can unravel the tangled skein and put the finances of this colony in a plain and palpable manner before the public. Well, let us see what he did when he had the absolute control of everything. As I have said, this document is urging the necessity of responsible government; and these, among other reasons, are given for the proposed change:—

"The necessity of such change has been made apparent from the actual state of the various departments of the Executive Government, and the condition of public affairs, as disclosed in the course of the business of the session. There appears to be no systematic plan for the management of Native affairs, or for effecting purchases of land from the Natives. The department of finance is without order or arrangement, nor, so far as we can learn, is there any effectual check over public expenditure. The Waste Lands Department requires thorough reorganization, not merely from its defective state, but in order to adapt it to recent changes. Complaints are heard from many quarters of the state of the Survey Department. There is no effectual system of public audit, and a difficulty is experienced in ascertaining the real state of the public accounts. Owing to this state of disorder and inefficiency, this House cannot, at this moment, ascertain the true state of the colony's outstanding liabilities.

"The accounts laid before us show wide discrepancies between the actual condition of the public finances and that stated in your Excellency's opening Address. Charges hitherto unknown to the public have been hitherto incurred which threaten to absorb the larger part of the territorial revenue of the southern provinces. Debentures on the public revenue are stated to be outstanding, issued without authority of law; claims on account of old debts, exceeding in the whole £100,000, still hang over the colony; a large mass of old land claims remain unsettled, as it is alleged, by default of the Government; and little or no progress has been made towards settling at rest disputes arising out of old land grants which, it is feared, may give rise to Native disturbances. Not only is there difficulty in ascertaining the extent of charges on the territorial revenue in the form of land scrip; but the issue of land scrip appears to be without any effectual check, control, or limit. A large percentage of the territorial revenue has been bargained away to the Natives without legal authority; public reserves have been improperly alienated; the Native reserves are without regulation by law.

"To sum up the case, the whole organization of government has appeared to this House in a state of weakness and disorder, demanding strong and immediate measures both for restoring it to healthy and vigorous action, and for adapting it to the recent constitutional changes.

"Under existing circumstances, the present officers of the Executive Government cannot, in the judgment of this House, continue to direct public affairs so as to satisfy the colony or win the confidence of the Legislature. They have been hitherto merely the instruments of a system of arbitrary rule, nor can it be expected that officers, under whose management disorders and abuses have grown up, should be ready and proper instruments for correcting them."

That, Sir, is the state in which the honorable gentleman left the colony after his last government—after a government of some six or seven years. It is always interesting to compare the promises of men with their actual performances. And now I come to consider the financial proposal which the honorable gentleman submitted to the House last night. Honorable members will see at a glance that the Statement is involved, inaccurate, and misleading. You have only to read the first paragraph and you will see that the honorable gentleman has not yet learned to distinguish between the Public Works Account and the consolidated revenue; he mixes up the two in such a way that nobody can form a clear idea of what he means. And yet he undertook to throw great light on the finances of the country. The honorable gentleman has learned wisdom by the short period of office he has enjoyed. He has evidently restrained the undisciplined ardour of his chief, because we all remember that, when that honorable gentleman proposed that we should change the incidence of taxation by running into the Ministerial room for a few minutes and bringing in a Bill, he at the same time said that he saw his way to immediately reduce the public expenditure by £100,000. But, now that he is in power, what does his Colonial Treasurer say? "As more than one-third of the present financial year has already elapsed"—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

Major ATKINSON.—That would be a very fair reason for taking £33,000 off the £100,000, and I should not object to such a proposal; but it is to the following words I wish to call the attention of the House: "and as much patient inquiry is requisite to prevent changes and reorganization of this kind becoming mischievous, and even dangerous to the public service"—he will do what?—"I shall adopt the Estimates of my predecessors." There we have an instance of the large difference between performances and promises. The Premier says that £100,000 can, in the course of five minutes, be struck off the Estimates; but the Colonial Treasurer has wisely found out that there is another side to the question. Then he goes on to tell us that he has a great objection to the present system of finance. I wish he would tell us what the present system of finance is that he objects to. I should like him to be more definite on that point, for then I should not have to set up a man of straw to knock down, but should have some argument to answer. However, the honorable gentleman tells us he objects to the system. I ask, What is the system he objects to? Does he object to borrowing money for public works?—for that is one part of the system. No, Sir, because he proposes to follow our footsteps in that respect. Does he object to borrowing money to consolidate our public debts? No, Sir, because, as I understand, the Premier—although there is some mystery in their finance at this point—proposes to carry through the Inscription of Stock Bill, and the Treasurer proposes to raise a loan of £4,000,000, one-half of which is for the purpose of consolidation. So that it is not to the system of consolidation that the honorable gentleman objects. Is it to borrowing in aid of revenue? No, Sir, certainly not, because, whereas I proposed to borrow £109,000 and charge it against the Otago Land Fund, the honorable gentleman proposes to borrow £300,000 in aid of the consolidated revenue. What, then, is the system to which the honorable gentleman objects? I have touched upon everything that we have been doing, and I should like to know what part of the system it is to which he objects. We now come to another paragraph. I was looking at the Colonial Treasurer the other day when my honorable friend the member for Totara got up and explained the desirability of considering another mode of obtaining supplies during the session of Parliament than by Imprest Supply Bills; and I was very much gratified by the eager interest which the Colonial Treasurer displayed. It was evidently a new light; and here we have it shadowed forth in the Statement. He has suddenly woke up to the fact that it is the duty of the Government to give this House more control over the money by calling the Assembly together some weeks earlier, or by altering the financial year. But has the honorable gentleman ever thought over what the consequence of that would be? Does he know that it was tried only a couple of years ago, and failed? Does he not know that it must necessitate this: that the House will have to be content to wait for some months for the Financial Statement, and, as is done in the Imperial Parliament, vote the Estimates irrespective of that Statement, or that the Statement will have to be based on estimates only for one quarter of the year and on actual facts for the other three quarters—that is to say, we shall have to assimilate our practice to that of the Imperial Parliament? I am perfectly certain that that will never be consented to by this House so long as our public works are of such great magnitude as compared with our ordinary revenue. We all know that this House invariably refuses to go on with the ordinary Estimates, or with any finance at all, till it has had the Financial Statement placed before it, and for this reason: that, whereas in England the finance is the ordinary expenditure of the country, here the real finance is the expenditure we make upon public works out of loan. If the proposal is carried out, that honorable gentleman will have to do what Sir Julius Vogel tried to do the year before last—namely, make his statement upon estimate for one quarter, and actual transactions for three quarters. I counsel the honorable gentleman not to try it. If he likes to do so, the House will not object; but I am quite certain it will be a failure. It is a matter

I have necessarily thought out very fully, and I believe it would be a very good plan if we could get the House to consent to it; but I say the House will never consent to it so long as our public works are so important a part of our finance. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the Treasury bills, as I have already dealt with that part of the subject; and I now come to the question of the provincial liabilities and the Supplementary Estimates, which I propose to treat at the same time. Here, I must confess, I am in a perfect maze. I have read the honorable gentleman's Statement, and I have thought sometimes that I must really know nothing about this account. At any rate, it is quite clear that either the honorable gentleman or I do not know anything about it. Let the House judge between us. The honorable gentleman says,—

I want to know what “unsupported” means, for I confess that I am utterly incompetent to understand it. £237,500 of the amount having been actually paid some months ago, what support can it want? I trust the honorable gentleman will explain to us what he means. The truth is, this £105,888 has no business there at all: it is quite meaningless. He has included it in the next paragraph in the outstanding liabilities of £279,766, and why he now puts it into this paragraph I cannot tell. The £237,500 is the expenditure actually made out of loan between 1st January and 30th June last; the £105,888 is the amount of provincial overdrafts outstanding on the 30th June. Apparently the honorable gentleman has not been travelling on an even enough track—to use his own expression—and is going to travel on one still more rugged; and so it seems. He says, “There are known to be, at the date on which I am now speaking, still further liabilities on Provincial Account outstanding amounting to £279,766.” But that includes the overdraft. If the honorable gentleman will turn to the Provincial Liabilities Account, he will see that it is so. Then he goes on to say that this is “reducible by about £30,000”—he is right there—“due from Land Fund and other sources, leaving a total to be provided for in some manner of £249,766.” Now, Sir, the position of the Provincial Liabilities Account is this: Last year I asked for authority to raise £250,000 out of loan to meet provincial liabilities coming in for payment between the 1st January and the 30th June last. There was actually paid out of that amount, as the honorable gentleman stated, £237,000 up to the 30th June. I estimated the outstanding provincial liabilities at £227,000 on the 30th June last. I had not then received the report of the Provincial Auditor of Otago, and could only make a rough estimate for that province. Therefore, in asking the House to make provision to meet the whole of the provincial liabilities, I asked for £259,000, to be taken out of the £2,000,000 the late Government proposed to raise, as will be seen in reference to my Financial Statement, in order to have a safe balance to cover all possible contingencies. I state now, again, most distinctly, that that amount provided for every species of provincial liability then outstanding or which ought to be outstanding at the present time. Every provincial liability then outstanding was provided for by that amount, and yet those honorable gentlemen have told the House and the country that there are liabilities to the amount of £200,000 not provided for. I am now giving a history of the matter, which those honorable gentlemen have failed to do, and therein have failed in their duty. Before I left office, as I pointed out in the Financial Statement which I had the honor to make in this House, I had prepared a list of all outstanding provincial liabilities, together with unexpended votes of the Provincial Councils—the unexpended votes which were in no way liabilities whatever. I will tell the House the history of those enormous votes for Otago. The honorable gentleman now the Minister for Lands when Superintendent of Otago had a correspondence with the late Government as to his large estimate of revenue, which he put down at £400,000 for nine months, I think. I am speaking from memory, and have not seen the papers upon the subject for fully a year, so that if I am wrong the honorable gentleman will correct me. After some correspondence with the Government, that amount was reduced by about £100,000, and votes were taken then, which are now under consideration and unexpended, upon this condition, and this condition only: that land was to be sold to meet them. There was never the slightest idea that these votes were to become burdens upon the colony. Such a thing was never for one moment entertained by any one. That, Sir, is the history of the Otago votes. This list—which the honorable gentleman, without consideration, took up and sent down to the House as provincial liabilities—was prepared, as I told the House in my Statement, to enable the late Government to determine which of these votes, in justice to the outlying districts, should be submitted for the favourable consideration of this House. We had that list prepared with the view of considering in Cabinet what votes we should submit for the approval of the House; but we had never any idea of sending them down as they were there. They had never been submitted to the Cabinet, and we had no idea of proposing that they should be charged against the consolidated revenue merely because Otago had chosen to vote enormous sums beyond its revenue, to the detriment of Auckland and other provinces—Auckland especially, which had kept within its means. Yet those honorable gentlemen, knowing all this—or, if they did not know it, they should have known it—came down and tell this House that we have neglected to make provision for this £200,000 for items which, without a shadow of reason, they call provincial liabilities. They are no more provincial liabilities than any votes we have to consider this session, and upon which no action has been taken, are colonial liabilities. We are absolutely free to reject one and all, and I hope the House will reject the majority of those of Otago unless they are made a local charge upon the Land Fund. We should not be justified one moment in voting these items unless they are locally charged, or equivalent votes taken for the other provinces. And here I would call the attention of the Auckland people to the conduct of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government. There will come a time, as there was before, when the honorable gentleman will be known in his true character.

Mr. MACANDREW.—What about Nelson?

Major ATKINSON.—Nelson has much less than its share. I will explain any point the honorable gentleman may desire at the proper time. I am going to call the attention of the people of Auckland to the conduct of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Government. No doubt at the present time it is a thankless task, but, like many other up-hill works that have good in their nature, it will bear fruit in its time. I have known the time when the people of Auckland had a pretty accurate estimate of the honorable gentleman, and I have not the least doubt that they will take a true measure of him again before many months are over. The honorable gentleman has been calling out for justice to Auckland. His constant cry has been, "Why don't you give Auckland her dues?" But now that he has the power, what has he done? He has put down £246,000 for Otago, and £8,000 for Auckland. Otago had already received £100,000, and Auckland £10,000. So that £350,000, in round numbers, was to be given to Otago, and Auckland was to get justice by receiving £18,000. Sir, I want to know why the honorable gentleman did not think about this when the question was before the Cabinet. I cannot suppose these things were sent down without consideration, because those honorable gentlemen have come in to set everything right. We might have made a slip, but those honorable gentlemen are far above such weaknesses. Everything they do is well-considered, and done with a set and just purpose. I want to know why the honorable gentleman, in dealing with these provincial liabilities, has not endeavoured to get that justice for Auckland for which he has been so loudly calling. I must read the last paragraph relating to these provincial liabilities, because it is so absolutely contrary to fact. The honorable gentleman says, "From the Statement of the late Colonial Treasurer, the House will have seen that there remain no available balances from loans upon which I can pretend permanently to charge any of these payments"—"these payments" being provincial liabilities. Now I have shown that half of the provincial liabilities have actually been paid out of loans, and, out of the £2,000,000 loan which I submitted for the approval of the House, £259,000 was provided for this year—that is, more than sufficient to cover the whole of them at present remaining up-paid. Then, what does the honorable gentleman mean by telling this House that there is no available fund upon which he could charge these liabilities? Sir, every one of them was amply provided for. We come now to the main feature in the honorable gentleman's finance. He is going to set the world right at last. He has found that, if he takes the Land Fund, if he "robs Canterbury," to put it in the words of the Premier, of a sufficient amount, he can balance his accounts; but I intend to show that he has entirely failed in the proposals which he has submitted to make both ends meet this year except by borrowing largely in aid of consolidated revenue. He proposes to attain two objects by the generalization of the Land Fund—to equalize the accounts, and to give confidence to the English money-lender. Now let us see how he proceeds to carry out these objects. There is, I may remark, a small discrepancy of £150,000, but that, I suppose, is a comparatively trivial error in a Financial Statement emanating from the honorable gentleman, which is supposed to be absolutely correct. In his statement of our estimate of Land Fund, the honorable gentleman tells us that the late Government estimated the Land Fund at £743,000. The estimate of the late Government, Sir, was £890,000, and if the honorable gentleman will turn to my Statement he will find it there. He has taken, not the Land Fund, but the land sales; but he is dealing with the Land Fund, and not the land sales only. That discrepancy is, of course, a venial offence on the part of the honorable gentlemen, who are of necessity absolutely accurate.

Mr. LARNACH.—I said "land sales" in my Statement.

Major ATKINSON.—The honorable gentleman must excuse me if I am in error. I take the honorable member's own Statement—the corrected Statement—and I find, in a paragraph headed "Land Fund—its Present Position," these words: "The Land Fund this year, I feel pleasure in saying, will be largely in excess of the sum estimated by the late Government. Their estimate was £743,000." I should be sorry to misrepresent the honorable gentleman, but I wish to point out that he had no business to deal with the land sales only, because he is dealing with the Land Fund. However, this may be a new light. It may be that he is going to deal with the land sales, and not with the Land Fund. If that is so, the House, I have no doubt, would like to know it. Now let us look at the proposals of the honorable gentleman. As I said, he proposes generally to accept my estimate of revenue and expenditure. It is known to you, Sir, that, in order to balance the revenue and expenditure, I proposed to take from the Land Fund of Otago and Canterbury the sum of £167,000. It is also known that, through striking out the capitation clauses of the Education Bill, the revenue will lose about £30,000, so that that also has to be provided. In round numbers, there is to be provided a sum of £200,000, in order to arrive at, what the honorable gentleman and all of us desire, an equilibrium of accounts: that is to say, to use the honorable gentleman's homely language, we shall require that sum "to make both ends meet." Let us see how he proposes to do it; and here again I will take his own figures. He tells the House that the land revenue for this year is to amount to a million of money. I do not question whether that is right or wrong. He says that the Land Fund is to amount to £1,000,000. I accept that statement for the purposes of my argument. He does not propose to generalize the Land Fund until the 1st January. As a matter of fact, he has told us that, up to the 30th September last, Land Fund to the amount of £542,231 had been paid into the Treasury. Well, it will not require a very great stretch of imagination to suppose that by the 1st January there will have been paid into the Treasury another £100,000. I have no doubt it will be a great deal more, but I am taking the figures of my honorable friend. Well, then, we shall be in this position: By the 1st January, of the million estimated by the honorable gentleman we shall have received £650,000; so that of the Land Fund this year there will go into the colonial chest £350,000. But of that amount the honorable gentleman proposes to localize £70,000, that is, 20 per cent., so that the actual receipts of the Colonial Treasury will be £280,000. But, Sir, the permanent charges upon the Land Fund for the six months from the 1st January to the 30th June amount to £322,000; that is half of the permanent charges, which amount to £643,000. Therefore the honorable gentleman will receive £280,000 from the Land Fund, and he will have to pay £320,000; so that, in order to cover a deficit which he has caused through not following the finance I submitted, he will have to meet an extra deficit of £40,000. Sir, I ask the honorable gentleman how he is going to do it. I call upon him to tell the House that, when he makes his reply. If I did not know that the honorable gentleman was so straightforward, and was going to let us have the whole truth and nothing but the truth, I should have thought he was rather concealing what he meant to do. When I turn to the end of his Statement I find that the honorable gentleman proposes to raise £300,000 in aid of the consolidated revenue nominally to repay public works; but this transaction really means aiding the consolidated revenue to that amount. Is that the way the honorable gentleman is going to meet his deficit?—because that is the only possible way under the present Statement. He was exceedingly angry and wroth with me for proposing to raise £109,000 against the Otago Land Fund. I have shown that he has got to meet a deficit of £240,000 this year after taking the Land Fund as proposed, and the only possible way of doing so under this Statement is by raising the £300,000 by loan direct in aid of the consolidated revenue. And this is the Government which is going to do away with all borrowing in aid of the consolidated revenue by taking the Land Fund. The Land Fund, in order to make a balance of accounts, must amount in this year to £1,300,000. If the honorable gentleman were to obtain £650,000 during the next half-year, then he would nearly get a balance. But, of course, I am arguing on the figures with which he has supplied us, and these figures are what we are bound to take as the probable outcome of the year's revenue. I say nothing of the very curious and apparently contradictory statements the honorable gentleman makes with regard to taking the Land Fund: I have accepted it as a fact that he means to do so. I find, however, that there is a great diversity of opinion as to his real meaning. I have read over very carefully those three paragraphs in reference to the Land Fund, and have consulted with other honorable gentlemen who read them over carefully; but none of us come to the same conclusion. It appears to me that he proposes to generalize the Land Fund by localizing it. He proposes to give 20 per cent. to the districts, and he proposes to spend the other 80 per cent. in the localities in which it is raised. I do not know if that is the proposal, but I hope, at any rate, if it is not, that he will put it in a little clearer light when he replies. But, Sir, the honorable gentleman says that, if, after due consideration, the Government should find that the interests of the colony necessitate it, they are prepared to undertake the main roads of the colony. Well, that may be very desirable. I know one or two counties that would be very glad indeed to have the main roads taken over immediately; but has the honorable gentleman really considered what this means? It means something like an extra deficit of half-a-million of money. And yet the honorable gentleman talks of it in this off-hand manner. Having already, by his mode of taking the Land Fund for the half-year, caused a larger deficit, he proposes to take over the maintenance of main roads, if advisable. If advisable, Sir! I can tell the honorable gentleman he will very soon find that it is unavoidable. If he gives such a hint as that to the counties, he will have such pressure put upon him as it will be almost impossible to resist: and where, then, will be the equilibrium of finance? The honorable gentleman, Sir, says he is going to do a great deal in the way of reduction of departmental expenditure. But he is going to put off doing so for the present. Now, although the Premier has told us that he could put his finger exactly on the places where the reductions could be made to the extent of £100,000, when he is put to the test he proposes to take time during the recess to consider it. But he is going to do a great work by reducing Ministers' salaries. Well, I confess I have an utter contempt for such a proposal. It means this: that the Government of the colony is to be given over to adventurers, or to men of considerable property. I say that you cannot obtain for the proposed salary the class of man that this House has a right to demand, unless he is a rich man. I appeal to the experience of honorable gentlemen who have been Ministers, whether any one of them did not go back a considerably poorer man than when he took office. I appeal to any Minister who has been in office, and I say that that is an absolute fact. If the honorable gentleman doubts it, let him have a Committee, and examine past Ministers. I am quite willing to come up to be examined. And here, Sir, in the item now under consideration I find another little inaccuracy. It is desirable to point it out, not that it is material, but because we are supposed to have nothing but what is absolutely accurate in this Statement. The honorable gentleman says that the Public Accounts Committee reported on the advisability of selling the "Hinemoa." Sir, the Public Accounts Committee have never made any report on the subject. The Weather Reporting Committee made a report; but they recommended, not that she should be sold, but that she should be kept. I, for one, as a North Island man, should exceedingly regret to see that steamer sold. I look upon the possession of the "Hinemoa" as a matter of insurance, as I look upon the necessity of maintaining a certain number of Armed Constabulary in the North Island. I say the Government will be doing a great wrong, both as regards the population of the North Island and as regards the possibility of great disasters in connection with the lighthouses, if they do not keep within their own authority a steamer ready for any emergency. I may state that when we were building a lighthouse at the Brothers, before we got the "Stella," we were actually obliged to abandon the work, because we could not find a steamer to go there for love or money. We had to go and beg the owners of a steamer to take off the men, who were in danger of starving there. Our request was granted, not in the way of business, but rather out of humanity. I say it is absolutely absurd to permit such a state of things to occur again. Then we come to railway management. I am not going to enter upon that question now, but I would point out to the honorable gentleman that here he is also apparently in the greatest darkness. He looks forward to an early report from the Railway Committee. But that Committee reported on the 6th November; their report was laid on the table a fortnight ago; and, Sir, the honorable gentleman was a member of that Committee. So thoroughly has the honorable gentleman mastered the details of his department; so thoroughly has he watched the organization, and considered the great reforms he was going to introduce! Now I come to the question of the loan. The honorable gentleman proposes to raise a four million loan. I would like to know why. Is the honorable gentleman going on with the Inscription of Stock Bill? If so, then a four million loan is unnecessary. He cannot possibly want more than two millions and a half. Even supposing he should persuade this House—which I do not think he will—to vote those provincial liabilities as they now stand, he could not want more than that amount. If he wishes to fund the Treasury bills, it will be a much simpler process to do so directly under the Inscription of Stock Bill than to raise the money as an ordinary loan, and then at considerable extra cost to inscribe it afterwards. Here I would like to call attention to a paragraph which, I must confess, I read with very great pain indeed, because it is absolutely at variance with fact. It is as follows:—

temporary loans in the colonies, has an effect even worse than imposing directly on the Home creditor. It encourages the people of this colony to fancy their liabilities to be smaller than they really are, and to agitate for a greater expenditure than the colony can afford. Fuller details of these questions will be given when the Loan Bill is brought down."

Now, I call upon the honorable gentleman to produce a single Financial Statement for the last seven years in which the whole of our indebtedness in Treasury bills, in advances, or in any form, is not fully set forth and summed up, and the whole amount treated as a liability of the colony. If he cannot do that, let him get up at once and retract the statement. I further call upon him to show a single statement by any public man of the colony, in which the question of the indebtedness of the colony has been discussed, where it has not invariably been the practice to include Treasury bills and every other liability for which the colony was indebted. I call upon him to show a single instance. As for concealing, I say that the public men of the colony, instead of concealing, have endeavoured upon every occasion rather to exaggerate than to diminish the public debt. If the honorable gentleman turns to any Financial Statement, or to the annual volume of statistics, he will find all the facts set forth. Then, I ask, what does the honorable gentleman mean by making such a statement in his place as a Minister of the Crown? I ask the honorable gentleman to turn to the volume of Statistics, or to Table A in every Financial Statement, and he will there see the true indebtedness of the colony, including Treasury bills and advances, as well as long-dated bonds. It is also stated in the body of the Financial Statement. Then how is it possible for the English creditor, or any person in the colony, to be misled in this matter? I say that the majority of the people in the colony do not distinguish between Treasury bills and the other indebtedness of the colony. They always look upon the indebtedness as one, and are indifferent as to the bonds under which the money has been borrowed. Sir, I have shown that the honorable gentleman has not only failed to make up the deficit caused by his rejection of my proposals by taking the Land Fund, but that he has even succeeded in increasing the deficit by £40,000. But, Sir, the honorable gentleman has another object in view in generalizing the Land Fund: he also desires to reassure the English creditor—the English money-lender. Now, I will ask honorable gentleman to turn to page 12 of the Statement, Table 1, to see the mode by which he proposes to reassure the English creditor. And this, Sir, is the way in which he proceeds to carry out so desirable an object: He shows that after taking all the Land Fund, and after providing for what he is pleased to term ordinary expenditure—though he ought to know, and must know, that some £700,000 of what he has put down is not ordinary expenditure in any sense of the term, although any one not acquainted with the colonial accounts would be led to suppose so from finding it so stated by the Colonial Treasurer—he has got a deficit of £711,000. This then, Sir, is his way of reassuring the English creditor by proving, by means of an absolutely false account, that we have a deficit, after taking the whole of the Land Fund, of £711,000. Sir, this is indeed good security upon which to found further borrowing. I should think that the honorable gentleman could borrow any amount upon that security. Now let us examine some of the details of this statement of expenditure. In it he includes—"Supplementary Estimates: Consolidated Fund, £112,000." He ought to know that included in that amount of £112,000 is £64,000 of liabilities, and that that amount is already taken off in striking the balance of £148,000, the surplus with which we began the year, and which surplus the honorable gentleman has accepted as correct, for he uses it in this table. Sir, I ask the honorable gentleman whether he knows that he has committed this error. If he does not, I say he ought to know it. Then I will ask him if it is honest and straightforward to put down the so-called provincial liabilities of £615,000 in this account at all, having no intention whatever of making it a charge against the revenue of this year. Sir, was it ever contemplated by this House that the provincial liabilities should be met out of revenue? Does the honorable gentleman himself contemplate meeting them in that way? Does any one believe for a moment that it is possible to make them a charge against the consolidated revenue? If the honorable gentleman meant to make them a charge against the consolidated revenue he ought to have told us so, and he ought to show us how he is going to make up the deficit of £711,000, as shown by this table. But, Sir, supposing the honorable gentleman did really propose to make this £615,000 a charge against the revenue, he was bound to have told the House, and taken credit for the following items which are assets, against this sum:—

From Consolidated Fund, under "Provincial Public Works Advances Act, 1874"...	£4,000
Receivable from the Trust and Loan Company ...	46,000
From Canterbury Railway Renewal Fund ...	32,715
Reclaimed Land, Wellington ...	100,000
	£198,215

But, Sir, I suppose that these are trifles beneath the consideration of the honorable gentleman—although he has undertaken to set the finances before the country with absolute accuracy. So much for Table No. 1: let us now look at Table No. 2. In that I think I perceive the work of the Hon. the Premier. I may be mistaken, but, at any rate, it is uncommonly like his work to calculate the daily rate of receipts and of expenditure. Did any Treasurer ever make out such a Statement before? What can be its object? Sir, I dare not say; but that it must, if it has any effect at all, deceive and mislead the public is certain; for any one would suppose, when told by the Colonial Treasurer that our daily expenditure exceeded our receipts by £1,900 a day, that nothing would be included in the expenditure except recurring expenditure; whereas in this case provincial liabilities are included to the extent of £615,000, and Supplementary Estimates which have been already provided for. I dare say the next thing the honorable gentleman will do will be to calculate how many pounds we spend in each minute. I say it is a very serious thing for the Colonial Treasurer—the gentleman responsible to this House for the finances of the colony—to put forth such a statement as that. I will say nothing more than that I think it exceedingly wrong in a person in his position to act as he has done in this matter. The Cash Balances Account, as shown on pages 10 and 11 of the Colonial Treasurer's Statement, is also misleading. It is an account which is prepared for the Treasurer weekly, and can only be understood by those having the key. I would ask what the public would understand on being told that there was a debit balance in London of £207,776, and a credit balance in the colony of £437,896, and saw one subtracted from the other in the account. They would naturally think that there was only a cash credit of £230,120. Nobody can understand the account unless he is acquainted with the manner in which this account is worked. I say that the debit balance which is said to exist in London is merely an imaginary balance. It is a mere matter of account. We have £300,000 worth of guaranteed debentures in London, and our London Agents are instructed to raise money on them from time to time to meet our requirements. The Auditors, knowing the amount of guaranteed debentures which we have in London, free, permit the Treasury to draw orders within that amount; but, until the Agents in London have reported what money they have raised to meet the drafts, it is not brought to credit, and so appears as in this case as a debit balance, although we have, as a matter of fact, money to our credit in London. These sums should therefore be added together, and not subtracted, and the balance of unpledged debentures should also be added if it is wished to know how we really stand; yet the Treasurer says not one word upon this subject. The Hon. the Premier made a great point when he referred to the £300,000 which under the authority of law had been borrowed from the Public Works Account, but could not, so he said, be repaid; and the Colonial Treasurer seems to have adopted the same views. Now the history of the £300,000 is this: The consolidated revenue is sufficient to meet the charges upon it, aided by certain contributions from the Land Fund in the manner which I proposed for the present year. But, Sir, large payments have frequently to be made at the beginning of a quarter, before the consolidated revenue has come in, and it is very often necessary to issue what are called deficiency bills to meet those payments. In England Exchequer bills are issued for the purpose. The Public Revenues Act authorizes the Government to issue deficiency bills to the amount of £300,000, or to borrow that from the Public Works Account. These deficiency bills have a certain short currency, and have always to be paid within a limited period. When we have a large amount of public works money to our credit, instead of borrowing at 5 per cent. upon deficiency bills, we use the money which we have in hand and for which we only receive 3 per cent., thus effecting a considerable saving of interest. The money borrowed from the Public Works Account is always repaid at the end of the year. The whole operation is neither more nor less than an easy means of obtaining a working balance, and the deficiency bills are identical with the Exchequer bills which are issued in England. Therefore, I say, it is simply misleading the House and the country to say that the £300,000 will not be repaid from the Consolidated Fund. We might, of course—although it would be curious finance—raise a permanent loan to make a working balance instead of issuing deficiency bills. If the honorable gentleman proposes to adopt that course we shall be able to consider whether it is advisable or not. My idea is that the present arrangement is the preferable one: at any rate, it is one which is most satisfactory to English financiers. I have to thank the House for having listened to me so attentively, and to express my regret that I have had to detain honorable members so long; but I felt that the subject was one of very great importance, and I was anxious to put it as fully as possible before the House. I hope I have succeeded in showing clearly that the finance of the last few years has not been a "hand-to-mouth" finance, or, in the words of the Colonial Treasurer, "a pawnbroking finance," but that we have always acted with a clear object in view, and that all our actions have been well and deliberately considered. With regard to the raising of a million of money from the banks in the colony, I may say that last year I called the attention of the House to the fact that it would be well to raise the money in the colony. The House assented to the proposal, and before raising the money we took advice on the subject from three influential quarters in London, and they all concurred in recommending us to follow the course we did. Therefore it is utterly wrong to call that "pawnbroking finance." Sir, I have shown that the finance of the last few years was reasonable, and that we really saw what we were doing, and I say that, had we been permitted to continue in office, we should have placed the finance of the colony, in the course of a few months, in a thoroughly satisfactory position. I have also shown, I think, that the Statement of the Colonial Treasurer, which I hold in my hand, is involved, unreliable, and misleading, and that the honorable gentleman has failed entirely to show anything like an equilibrium of the accounts: in fact, his proposals, if his figures are reliable, if given effect to will leave a deficit of £240,000 to be provided for, and this can only be met, not by borrowing, as I propose, £109,000 against the Otago Land Fund, but by raising, as proposed by the honorable gentleman, £300,000 in aid of consolidated revenue.

Sir G. GREY. — The task which I have to perform in answering the honorable gentleman who has just spoken is in one respect difficult. I have to answer a very rambling statement, an excessively ill-arranged speech; and it is impossible to make a reply to such a speech at all interesting, and impossible for the speaker to carry his auditors with him. I shall have to ramble from point to point: necessarily I must strive to reply to his arguments somewhat in the order in which they occurred. I shall endeavour to do so, and shall try to lead the House to a different conclusion from that to which he strove to lead honorable members. The honorable gentleman opened his speech by explaining that we were wrong in thinking that the Government to which he had belonged was a continuous Government. I believe, Sir, that he dealt disingenuously with that subject. We affirm that it was a continuous Ministry, and one of an exceedingly bad kind—a Government the object of which was to keep itself in office—a Government which got its strength, not by any power or ability in its own ranks, but by leading one by one the best men away from the Opposition—gentlemen who they thought might bring them strength—thereby threatening and creating dismay in the ranks of the Opposition. They took the unconstitutional course of destroying all party government; they adopted the wrong course of preventing the voice of the people being heard within this Assembly, because coalitions were always taking place: thus hoping to preserve, at all risks, a majority which might enable them to carry out plans opposed to the public interests, however well calculated they may have been to promote the views of their friends. Thus they were a continuous Government. But that Government has, we believe, for ever been destroyed. We believe that such a system will never again arise in this House. Then the honorable gentleman went on to try to show us that the great evils and difficulties which had fallen upon New Zealand have arisen from the existence of provincial institutions in this country. To that I reply, Sir, that he knew very well that the difficulties did not arise from the provincial system in its integrity, but that it arose because, the House of Representatives having deprived the provinces of their powers and revenues, and having thoroughly impoverished them, their existence became an impossibility. Had they allowed the provinces to retain the revenues placed at their disposal by law, they would now have been in healthy and active operation, and none of those difficulties would have arisen upon the floor of this House which occurred when the General Assembly of New Zealand, or, rather, the House of Representatives, grasped the funds of the provinces, and scrambled for them within the walls of this House. That was the beginning of our misfortunes—that was the ruin of the provincial system; and the honorable gentleman knows that.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—He says he does not know it. He may tell that to the House and the country, but I know what they will think with regard to that statement. The honorable gentleman then went on to describe, in glowing terms, what had been done by the Government of which he was a member. There is always difficulty in meeting such a statement. Masses of figures are hurriedly quoted—perhaps, often incorrectly, but the incorrectness of which it is impossible to show during a hurried debate. Into the details of that I will go presently; but he spoke with what, considering the facts of the case, I may say was an audacity of manner which filled me with surprise. He told us there were no difficulties, and that there was ample cash to meet all demands—

Major ATKINSON.—Hear, hear.

Sir G. GREY.—The honorable gentleman says, "Hear, hear." He said he had made arrangements with the Bank of New Zealand by which we could borrow more money. That was his statement. Is that amplexness of cash? Has the honorable gentleman no sense of shame? Has he become so accustomed to indebtedness, to living upon charity, to holding out his hands for aid, that he considers the concealed power of borrowing money from unwise persons as an amplexness of cash? What is our amplexness of cash? At the present moment, our engagements in this country amount to very large sums to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. I see the honorable gentleman smiling. He ought to be ashamed of leaving the country in such a state. I would prefer to see that he felt sorrow for the difficulties into which he has plunged New Zealand. The balance we have in the Treasury on this day, to meet our wants, is £24,761; and the total sum we have at our command at the present moment, calculating all accounts in every place, is £228,419. The honorable gentleman told us that he had borrowed a sum of £300,000 from the Public Works Account, but that it would be repaid at the end of the year, and could easily be repaid. He knew that such was not the case.

Major ATKINSON.—I knew no such thing.

Sir G. GREY.—He knew no such thing. I know that what he said was not true, and he ought to have known it. I hold in my hand a memorandum from the Secretary to the Treasury, dated the 18th November. He says,—

"The Public Works Account now shows a nominal overdraft of £226,496 18s. 2d.; against which there is available the amount of the Guaranteed Debentures yet in hand, £375,000; giving, as the available ways and means of the Public Works Account to-day, £148,503 1s. 10d. The expenditure on Public Works Account for the past six weeks has been at the rate of about £27,000 a week; and, at that rate, the balance of £148,000, above referred to, will be exhausted in five or six weeks. As you are aware, the Consolidated Fund is indebted to the Public Works Account for an advance of £300,000; but I see no probability of the Consolidated Fund being in a position to repay the amount at present.—C. T. BATKIN."

Sir G. GREY.—It cannot. He must know that there is a deficiency in the present state of the colony with regard to finance. Then, on the 1st February next, we have to meet in London a sum of £326,247, for which no provision has been made. That is for interest upon our loans. Such is our position, and that is what the honorable gentleman calls amplexness of cash. The next thing we were told, Sir, was that we could get out of all our difficulties by means of the Bill for the inscription of stock. I may say that in my belief it is doubtful if it is desirable that we should go on with that Bill. I believe our doing so would be disadvantageous to the country, as it simply means that we should write fresh loans against the credit of the colony. It is simply another means of borrowing. One would have imagined that great profit was to be gained by the transaction; but it is nothing of the kind. It is simply a proposal to borrow further sums. Having fed so long upon charity, the honorable gentleman now wishes to call into existence another being, unaccustomed to his wiles, with whom he may deal with some chance of success. A more impudent proposal was never made in any Legislature. The honorable gentleman then said that, with regard to the provincial liabilities, ample provision had been made to meet them. I listened with the greatest interest, and wondered where were these ample means. I even ventured to ask "How?" but no answer was elicited; he simply said that provision had been made. I say that no provision has been made. Where are the funds? £24,761 is all the money we possess. Where is the provision? I ask; and Kebo answers, Where! It is visionary. The honorable gentleman then proceeded to attack myself, and he read a statement made against the Government, in 1854, some time after I had quitted the colony, when the General Assembly desired, above all things, to see responsible government introduced into this colony, and when the General Assembly was bound to find the best reasons for making that demand. Under such circumstances that document was written. The honorable gentleman then left me alone till a later period of his speech, when he addressed the population of Auckland, and told me that my present action would bear fruit, as my action had borne in the past. My answer to that is, that the past has borne fruit; that years have elapsed; that the tooth of disappointment has ceased to gnaw upon my good name, as far as these times are concerned; that the hatred of disappointed men in those days has ceased to pursue me; and that the people more calmly judge of the past. That fruit of which he warned me has been this: that my fellow-countrymen have now rewarded me with their affection and with their regard—that the calmness of the historian has had to deal with those events, and the statements of passionate and disappointed men of the time are taken at their true value. And I have no doubt that, when another five-and-thirty years have passed from the present moment, the railings of the honorable gentleman against me will also be forgotten: that the fruit that will then surround my grave will be similar to the garlands which those who have been so kind to me lately have, may I say, placed upon my head. I do not fear the threat which the honorable gentleman holds out. I know that then, so many years ago, I earnestly devoted myself to promote the welfare of this country. I know that, in my old age, I am trying to do the same thing. I know that Death is following me with closely-approaching steps; and my only desire is that, in the short time that is left me, I may hastily accomplish all the good that I would gladly achieve for this country. Sir, I utterly disregard the taunts which the honorable gentleman in that respect threw out. The honorable member stated that I had talked a great deal of the reduction of the expenditure, but that I had done nothing. Sir, one month I have been in office, and during that month a Fury has pursued me, in the shape of the honorable member for Egmont. He has given me no rest. He has occupied by reproaches every moment of my time. He has been doing nothing but clamouring for return to office again. He has embittered my existence here, springing to his feet at every moment with a vote of want of confidence, or inducing the representative of Wellington City to propose a vote of censure; and then, quarrelling with him for trying to put himself at the head of the Opposition, so that, perchance, he might be sent for by the Governor, and thus prevent the honorable member for Egmont from again enjoying his monthly pay, he compelled the honorable member for Wellington City to withdraw the notice of his motion. Such are the difficulties that I have had to contend against during all this month. With the aid of my colleagues, I have had to devise a great plan which we hoped might extricate this country from its difficulties, and restore to the people the liberties of which they have been defrauded. It has been no easy task, and even in the midst of that task we have had to rely upon the retrenchment which we believe we can carry out. Am I to be reproached by the honorable gentleman that in this short period of time we have not been able to accomplish more? I say that our position has been one full of difficulties. The honorable gentleman had the whole recess to prepare his Estimates and his Financial Statement; and how dexterously he has managed, up to the present moment, to prevent us from discussing the Financial Statement! We have had, during this long session, no fair opportunity afforded for bringing that Statement of his under consideration; but, keeping our noses to the grindstone by the party which he had at his back, he has forced from us a Financial Statement. On one night it is delivered, and the next night our enemy, with his railing tongue, is upon us. He told this House that he and his friends had always taken care that Parliament should scrutinize every penny that they spent, and carefully vote what sums they proposed to expend. He knew well enough that in succeeding sessions we never could get at the Financial Statement. He knew perfectly well that, for the years he has been in office, he got impost supplies passed, as he has done this session: that really the expenditure in large measure was incurred before any sums were voted: that he sprang to his feet if we said a word about it. When we said that the statements put forth were wrong, he said, "I challenge honorable gentlemen to prove that; I will by-and-by give them an opportunity of proving it; I will then make them prove it; I will force them to prove it." Myself and the honorable member for Parnell waited last session for a month, and yet no opportunity was afforded. The honorable member for Parnell went away; he gave it up in despair: and it was not until the very end of the session that the honorable gentleman allowed the Financial Statement to come under consideration at all. How different has our conduct been! We have shrunk from nothing of the kind. We have attempted to keep nothing back from the House, nor to prevent the immediate discussion of measures that we have brought forward. I ask the House to contrast these two lines of conduct. Then, in a very triumphant tone, the honorable gentleman said that we had adopted his financial measures—that my honorable colleague the Colonial Treasurer adopted the Estimates as they stood. What was the meaning of that, Sir? What time had we, at this period of the session, to prepare Estimates? The honorable gentleman knows perfectly well that the main portions of those Estimates relate to services that go on year by year, and that the mere adoption of them signifies nothing at all. We adopted them, stating that we disapproved of them, and that we intended enormously to reduce them. How could we, in the few weeks that were left to us, tell exactly what all those reductions should be? He knew, as well as I, that we could not have done that, and that the course we took was the one most conducive to the public interests. We say that we bring them forward simply as matters to be voted by the House—as indicating an expenditure which is not to be surpassed; and we pledge ourselves to the House to keep our expenditure greatly within those Estimates. I think that plan was wise; I think it was prudent; and I believe it to be one that will commend itself to this House and to the whole of New Zealand. Then, Sir, the honorable gentleman asked—and he asked in a triumphant tone; he looked across the House at myself, as much as to say that I ought to sink into utter insignificance or to subside in shame—what was the objection to his finance? My objections to it are that it was a finance for friends, not for the people of New Zealand. That is my first objection to the finance of the honorable gentleman. I disapprove of a finance beginning with, "My dear Pollen, I have lived rather extravagantly. I want so much more money." I have an objection to a finance which makes roads and railroads through property occupied by persons who are enormously enriched thereby, whereas the cost of those roads and railroads has to be defrayed by the community at large, who are reaping no advantage from them. I object, Sir, to a finance which entails unnecessary expenditure upon the country. I object to a finance which I regard as a finance for friends. What I look forward to is a finance for New Zealand, regulated by the people themselves, based upon a fair system of taxation, based upon every item expended being voted by this House—a finance approved of by a House of Representatives fairly elected by the people of New Zealand, and actually representing the entire population of this country. That, Sir, is what I call a proper system of finance. The objection I have to that system which we hope to see abolished, never to be restored, is, that it was not a system of finance of that kind. Sir, part of our system of finance is this: that sums realized by dealing with the public lands of the colony shall pass into the Consolidated Fund, and be voted by the people of New Zealand through their representatives. A result of that system of finance will be, that it will be impossible unlawfully or by wrong means to dispose of any portion of the public lands, because the whole people of New Zealand will have an interest in every acre in this country. There will no longer be confiscated lands to be dealt with down in the Government House, the Governor being required to put his name, as a matter of form, to certain Orders in Council which are to secure lands for friends. Such things cannot take place under one fair land law and one Land Fund for the whole population of New Zealand. No acre of land can then be parted with except under laws watched by this House in their execution as well as in the mode by which they are passed. Contrast the one system of finance with the other, and then say, am not I justified in raising objections to that system which has hitherto prevailed, and of which the honorable gentleman is so enamoured? Let him appeal to the constituencies of this country, and ask what are their objections to that system of finance. Let him go into the home of the artisan, taxed to pay to make roads to the door of some great landed proprietor, and ask him what are his objections to that system of finance. Let him ask the whole population of New Zealand whether they approve of a system of finance the effect of which is to enrich a certain class by the impoverishment of all the rest. I say that such a system of finance must cease to exist here—must vanish from this country, never to return. And the honorable gentleman may depend upon it that the knell has struck—that himself and his finance will never more be heard of here. The honorable gentleman spoke a great deal upon the subject of provincial liabilities. I have simply to say that the statement we laid before the House is an absolutely correct statement, prepared by the Government department, handed to us as accurate, scrutinized by ourselves, and established to our satisfaction. I was shocked at one part of the honorable gentleman's proposal. He said that I was wronging Auckland, because I was doing justice to other places. It was a misfortune, perhaps, to Auckland not to have any large claims included in these provincial liabilities, because of the prudence of those who administered her affairs, and who would not allow the Council to pass estimates beyond the revenue. My desire to aid Auckland is no reason why I should do wrong to other people. It was an improper proposal to make to me, that I should wrong the public in other parts of New Zealand, because justice had not been done to Auckland. And, Sir, the Auckland people would scorn a proposition of that kind. They will rely upon the liberality of the House to remedy the injustice which has been done to them. Scant justice can, at least, be rendered; but it would be no justice to rob others to give to them. We admit the claims of other provinces unhesitatingly; but we will attempt to defraud none—we will attempt to rob none; and we shall do justice to Auckland without taking from other provinces that which is their due. Auckland will bear me out in this. I do not fear that; but, did I fear it, I would do my duty still. The honorable gentleman tells us that, to balance revenue and expenditure under our proposals, a sum of £200,000 is required, and he asks us how we propose to provide it. I say that it is impossible for us to put any really true estimate before this House until we can fully ascertain the reductions we can make in the expenditure. It is well to cry out upon us and say, "Do this instantly: do it without delay." Sir, we will do it prudently; we will do it wisely. Next session, we shall have fully seen what reductions in the public expenditure can be carried out—and we are well advised that they are very large—and when that is done we will come to the House with proper Estimates and every possible detail, and we will ask the House to adopt those Estimates. But, until that time comes, the House must have confidence in us, and must say, "Provided you do not exceed the sum which your predecessors said was necessary, do what you like. Make every reduction you can—we rely upon you to do that; but we will not be so unwise as to positively demand that, within the short period of time you have been in office, pressed upon by the thousand cares which have beset you, you shall attempt to furnish Estimates of that nature. We know that it will be unfair to you and unfair to the country to expect you to do so—that you could only mislead us and mislead others; and you must not mind that gentleman, hungering for office, who comes from Mount Egnont, and who does not represent our views and feelings. We will deal more fairly and more generously with you." We are confident that amongst those whom the honorable gentleman styles his followers there are men who will deal more generously and more fairly with us than he has done. We feel sure of that, Sir; and, in making the request for generous confidence which we have made, we feel that we have preferred no request which is not justified, or which ought not at once to be conceded to us. I feel sure that, if that confidence is bestowed, we shall yet be able to extricate New Zealand from the difficulties which threaten it; that next session we shall produce a Financial Statement satisfactory alike to the House and to the country, and shall propose to Parliament estimates which will meet a general and wide-spread approval. The honorable gentleman then proceeded to say that I had made a statement that £27,000,000 had been spent in five years, and he told the House that that was absolutely inaccurate. I think the sum he mentioned in correction, as that which had really been expended, was £11,000,000. To that I answer, that out of the consolidated revenue and the Land Fund, during five years, £12,426,000 has been spent; that out of borrowed money £13,000,000 has been spent; and in provincial expenditure £1,500,000: making a total of £26,926,000. That has been the expenditure during five years.

Major ATKINSON.—What the honorable gentleman did say was that I had raised and spent twenty-seven millions of money. That was the statement.

Sir G. GREY.—I never said that that sum had been raised by the honorable gentleman. I knew his powers of mendacity were great, but I never believed that the world contained people so foolish as to lend to him £27,000,000 in five years. Those who know me will give me credit for greater wisdom than that. The honorable gentleman commented upon our proposed reduction of the salaries of Ministers; and, Sir, in so doing, he made remarks derogatory to the character of the people of this country. He said that, if Ministers' salaries were reduced, the government of the colony would be given over to adventurers. In my belief, to give exorbitant salaries would be the means of inducing adventurers to aspire to office. I hold that the best means by which you could draw adventurers into the struggle and strife for office would be, to hold out great rewards in the shape of high salaries. I believe that there are quiet and prudent men in this colony who will well administer its affairs upon moderate salaries; and I think it was an insult to the entire community of New Zealand to say that, unless you gave high salaries, you would not have in office the "kind of men"—that was the expression used—that this country wanted. I have travelled over every part of New Zealand. I know men who have been living upon small farms for years—men who received a high education, many of them professional men, men of ability equal to any one in this House, living upon small incomes, perfectly capable of administering the affairs of the country; and those men would gladly fulfil their duty to the country for less salaries than we propose to give. The honorable gentleman shakes his head; but I say that such is the case. I say that there are now in public life in New Zealand men whose parents were in circumstances of comparative poverty, not well off at all, and that those men are amongst the leading minds that we have in New Zealand at the present day—that in public life, in public offices, in every department of the State, they have raised themselves to important positions, they have honorably and faithfully fulfilled their duties, and they are now amongst the leading men of the country. They began with small salaries; and, notwithstanding the taunts heaped upon myself by the honorable gentleman, I say that, in former years, when salaries were small, and when there was a fair opening given to every man in the colony, that ability was brought forward which has since adorned New Zealand in so many offices, so many stations of life. I say that increase of salaries beyond a certain amount has only added to extravagance, and has not created ability in public life. I believe that it has rather led to worthless men struggling for office than the contrary; and I believe that a return to principles of economy and of prudence in the lives of our public men will be a great boon to the colony, and a worthy example to set. In other young communities we have seen that principle established and worked out. How small was the income that Washington ever had from the State! Was he degraded by living in a small house in his old age, upon a small income? Have the greatest men America ever produced had such incomes as have been given here? Why, the President of the United States is not so highly paid as our Governor, and yet he rules one of the greatest nations in the world. And what men that people have had as rulers! Yet the honorable member for Egmont can stand up here and traduce such men! Men like himself must have £1,800 a year, and fine houses to live in, all provided at the public expense. They can get no brains, they can get no integrity, unless at high salaries of that kind. I say, the Lord deliver us from such men! Let us try a different system, and we shall have less public expense. Great private expense leads to great public expense. The whole thing is upon a wrong system. Let us begin properly at the top here, and then go lower down, gradually proceeding through each rank as far as necessary. You will find that you will soon reach a rank where you must stop—a point where it would be hard to make reductions in salaries; but there must be an end to these high salaries. The idea of adequate payment for all services, however high or however humble, is a forgotten idea in the colony, but one which must be enforced here. Then the honorable gentleman was very witty—extremely witty—with regard to my honorable friend the Colonial Treasurer, because that honorable gentleman said he hoped in a few days the Railways Management Committee would make their report, which report had already been made, although it has only to-night been put in our hands in a printed form; and yet the honorable gentleman, speaking of my honorable friend, says that this mistake was a great crime to be laid to our charge. I hope my honorable colleague the Colonial Treasurer feels humbled, as he ought to do, and is now satisfied that conclusive proof has been given that, with all his knowledge of business, and all his devotion to duty, he is absolutely unfit to sit on these benches because he made use of such an expression. Oh, Sir, when such things are to be accomplished in this country as are now required to be done, that the honorable member for Egmont should get up and say, "You are unworthy to undertake these things, because you did not know that the Railway Management Committee's report was issued"! The man who could make a mistake of that kind is, we are asked to suppose, quite unfit to carry out a great plan of making the Land Fund consolidated revenue. He is quite incapable of telling the people of New Zealand that there shall be fair and liberal land laws for the future, under which all, whether they have influence or no influence, whether they have wealthy friends or no wealthy friends, shall have the same right to buy the land which is the common property of all! What a fatal objection has been brought against us in this respect! What right have we to complain of the vast expenditure which has gone on hitherto, or the worse than useless way in which the public funds have been squandered, when a mistake of that kind can be made? The Inscription of Stock Bill was then alluded to; but I have already referred to that, and need not say any more about it. I will pass on to the remarks upon the subject of the floating debt. We were accused of saying something very wrong when we stated that the effect of a floating debt was to conceal our real position from the public creditor. I say that such a floating debt does conceal our position from the public creditor. I say the public creditor in London knows nothing of the million borrowed from the banks here, or of the £832,000 of Treasury bills issued here. The honorable gentleman says, "Is it not all to be found in my Statement?" He believes, Sir, that the trump of Fame blows his name all over the world—that it is ringing in all ears; that his Statement occupies all minds in Great Britain, from the occupant of the throne even to the groom in the stable; that they have all fair warning of the sums the honorable gentleman is borrowing here. I say, No. The funded debt of the colony is what they look to; and no honest State, at this distance from the London market, ought to have a floating debt such as we have. I quite agree with the remarks which my honorable colleague made, and I say that not only does a floating debt of that kind conceal our position from the public creditor at Home, but it also, to a great extent, conceals our real position from the people of the colony, and leads to their making demands for expenditure of money which I believe they would not make if thoroughly acquainted with their real position. Then my honorable friend was taunted with this: "Ah! ah! you wish to inspire confidence in the money market in respect to the colony, and what do you do? You have a deficit, and you show it." But I reply, that will inspire confidence. I say that to boast, as the honorable gentleman opposite did, that he had a surplus when he had none—to telegraph to London that the surplus last year was so and so, when there was no surplus—was not the way to inspire confidence. I say that the plain, blunt honesty of my honorable colleague, telling the truth, the whole truth, and concealing nothing, will inspire confidence.

Major ATKINSON.—Read the papers.

Sir G. GREY.—I assert the honorable gentleman had no surplus last year.

Major ATKINSON.—I must correct the honorable gentleman. Here is the statement of the present Colonial Treasurer that there was a surplus of £148,220.

Sir G. GREY.—The honorable gentleman knows perfectly well that the Colonial Treasurer said that, for the purpose of argument, he adopted the figures of his predecessor, and that amount had to be shown. My honorable colleague sits next to me, and he will answer for himself that he does not believe that there was any surplus last year; and he believes, as I do, that a delusion was presented to this House. It was the belief of all those who entered into the accounts that such was the case; and I say the plain, blunt, and honest statement of the real position of our affairs will restore confidence in the money market at Home, and will clearly prove that we have laid the absolute state of our affairs before this country and before the public creditor at Home, showing, as it does, that a deficiency is likely to occur this year, but that our assets on the whole are good, and that it is certain that we shall be able next year to make a good and favourable Statement. That will restore confidence far more than the system of boasting of surpluses which do not exist, of telegraphing those surpluses Home, of having the telegrams inserted in all the papers, and then, at the end of each month, having them cut out of the newspapers, pasted into a book, and sent out for the gratification, I suppose, of the Colonial Treasurer, who all the time is laughing at the way in which people at Home were being gulled. I say the system of my honorable colleague is the true and honest system—a system which will commend itself to every man. Then we were told that we had no business to put the provincial liabilities forward in the way we have done—the propriety of the step was altogether questioned; but I say that it was our duty to tell the truth, and the whole truth. We have kept nothing back that we knew. That we as yet know all the liabilities of the colony I am not well assured; but it was our duty to bring forward everything that we knew. An attack was made upon myself the other night in reference to this matter. It was said that I brought forward claims made by contractors against the Government, and that I ought not to have done so. I assert that it was my duty to tell the House that those claims were in question, but I was told that I ought not to have done so.

Mr. McLEAN.—I said the honorable gentleman was treating them as liabilities of the colony when they were not.

Sir G. GREY.—I said there was a contingent liability existing against the colony; and I was surprised at the honorable member for Waikouaiti making the remarks he did. He thought I ought to have joined in that plan of concealment which he pursued; but I say it was my duty to make that statement. I was justified in what I said, seeing that the very first of these claims, one for £800, which had been tested by the inquiry of a Committee, was allowed in toto, as a legitimate liability. The whole of these claims amount to £170,000, and, when the liability of the colony was proved in regard to the first, it was a very startling fact. It was our duty to make to this House a plain and true statement of every liability that came under our knowledge, which the colony might have to meet. Then the honorable member was pleased to say—and this is the last thing I shall comment upon—that the cash balances published with the Financial Statement are entirely misleading. That certainly amazed me. They are the absolute cash balances of the colony. They are true; they are accurate; and how anything true and accurate can be misleading I cannot understand. They are not only true and accurate, but they were published in the precise form in which they are furnished for the information of the Government. We desired the House to have a perfect knowledge of the state of our affairs, and we laid before it the cash balances in the exact form in which they came to our own knowledge. How, then, could we have desired to mislead the House in laying these balances before it? I must say that, of all the unfair accusations I have ever heard made, that was the most unfair. The honorable gentleman made it for reasons that to me are utterly incomprehensible. I can only assure the House that the cash balances in these tables are true, exact, and the very balances put before the Government for their guidance, and that I could have no desire to mislead the House, and my honorable colleagues could have no such desire, in laying those statements before it. I have now followed the honorable gentleman throughout his statements, and have replied to them to the best of my ability. I think I have shown that they were in the main fallacious. I hope I have convinced honorable members that there was nothing in those statements which should disentitle us to the confidence of the House. I should not have replied with the asperity that I may perhaps be considered to have shown, had I not been compelled to meet an attack which I regard as eminently unfair and unnecessary. If the honorable gentleman had confined himself to a defence of his own finance, or to an exposition of ours, it would have been a different matter. But attacks were made on myself and others, and even the honorable gentleman's defence of his own system of finance was unfair. I believe the House feels that that system is unsound, and that it is necessary that a great change should take place in New Zealand—that a policy shall be established which shall be the policy of the people and not of a class. I and my colleagues are determined to strive to establish such a policy, and to base it upon such a sound system of representation that it will be the fault of the people themselves if it is ever disturbed after we have once established it. If we succeed in doing that, I, for myself, shall be prepared to pass away from this world; and I know that my colleagues, on their part, will be prepared to retire from public life, and to rest contented that they have conferred a vast boon upon the inhabitants of New Zealand.

Mr. McLEAN.—Although unprepared to speak this evening, I should not like to see this debate brought to a close without saying a few words. I may say, at the outset, that I do not think the Premier has in any way answered the arguments or disturbed the figures of my honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer: in fact, he has only touched on a very few of them, and to those I will confine myself, and not tire the House with a repetition of what my late colleague has so ably dealt with. The Premier has endeavoured to throw dust in the eyes of the people of New Zealand by the use of high-flown language which I could never venture to imitate. I do not profess to have a fine flow of language, neither have I that facility for gulling the public which the Premier possesses; but I venture to say that all the gulling that he has indulged in will not satisfy the public of Otago and Canterbury that he is justified in robbing them of that which is their right. It is for the purpose of condemning the proposals which the honorable gentleman and those associated with him have dared to bring down to this House, that I raise my voice against him to-night—proposals coming from the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Macandrew), a man that Otago, from the treatment he had received at her hands, would expect to be her protector. The honorable gentleman said the statement of my honorable friend the member for Egmont was a rambling statement; but did anybody ever listen to a more rambling statement than that to which the honorable gentleman treated the House? Sir, if I were to use the same pitiful voice and take out my handkerchief and weep, it is possible that I also might get some sympathy from honorable members. It only required the honorable gentleman to take out his handkerchief and wipe his eyes to complete the scene. But I venture to make this remark: that if any other honorable member had been guilty of using such language as the honorable gentleman has used he would have been hooted down. Amongst other rambling statements, the honorable gentleman said the object of the late Government was to keep in office, and to carry out schemes for the benefit of their friends rather than for the advancement of the public good. It is very easy to make such wild statements, but why did not the honorable gentleman particularize instances in support of that statement? He could not do so, for the reason that no such cases existed. I dare him or any other honorable member to point to one single instance where we have benefited our friends to the sacrifice of public interests, or to point to any cases where the late Government perpetrated any injustice, either directly or indirectly, by which the public interests suffered. He said that we were in possession of large sums of money which were squandered to benefit our friends. The very contrary is the fact. I am sorry to say that since I have been in office we have been compelled to pull the purse-strings very tightly, in order that the expenditure should be brought within reasonable limits. It was absolutely necessary to do so for the sake of maintaining our credit in London, and to put our finances in a sounder position. Sir, it is no easy task to pull the strings tight and at the same time to satisfy the public, after the lavish expenditure to which they have become accustomed in all parts of the country. The difficulties we had to face were of no ordinary character. We had to maintain the credit of the colony—to curtail our expenditure and bring it within our means; and every impartial man will admit that we have in a great measure succeeded. And to think that, after all our pains, after all the efforts which we have made to induce the people of the colony to be frugal, they are to be completely upset by the action of the present Government; that we dare not go into the money market without the fear that our loans would be placed at a discount, and that we should appear discreditable in the eyes of the other colonies! Why, Sir, the great aim of the Government since I have been connected with it has been to try to raise our securities, and to deal with them in such a way that they would stand as high as those of any other Australian colony. Well, Sir, I am anxious to see the Estimates of those honorable gentlemen, that we may judge how far they have carried out their professions. It will be found, when they bring down their Estimates, that they have a very large expenditure to provide for—far greater than we should ever have thought of proposing—an expenditure which they have no means of meeting, and for which, they say, they are going into the London money market for a loan of four millions. The honorable gentleman also said that if the provinces had the revenue which properly belonged to them they would have been able to carry on without any assistance, and that Abolition need not have taken place. I dispute that entirely. I say that it was the extravagance of the provinces, and the constant pressure they brought to bear on this House, that led to their Abolition. The House was driven into it. I could never see where this borrowing was to end; and it was with the view of providing a system of finance that would keep our expenditure within our income that members voted for doing away with the provinces. While the provinces lasted they were the buffers between the public and this House, and the public could never ascertain the state of the finances. Even an expert could hardly understand them on account of the partnership accounts. But now we are getting into a simple system of accounts that any one in the colony can understand. That is not owing to the honorable gentlemen who are now on the Government benches. That simplicity of finance has been brought about by my colleague the late Colonial Treasurer. The honorable gentleman said we were borrowing from the bank and living on charity. Now, I would like to know whether, if any one in this House goes to a merchant or a bank and borrows money for a certain number of years at a fixed rate of interest, he is living on charity. Have we not a right to make a bargain for a period with any one for money, and is that living on charity, and not an ordinary daily business transaction? Is there any difference between borrowing in the colony and borrowing in London? Will not the borrower know that we raise money in the colony if we do so? There is no necessity to go to London if we can borrow money elsewhere on equally favourable terms: the markets of the world are open to us, and we can borrow where we please. If we do borrow it is shown in the Financial Statement of the Colonial Treasurer, which is accessible to every investor in London or in the colonies. When a loan is tendered for in London the number of people who tender is small, because the public deal through their agents, who take very good care that the whole indebtedness is placed before investors before they take the bonds. Therefore it is useless to say that we hid our finance in any way from the public creditor. Our finance was quite as open and straightforward as any finance in any part of the colonies or the British Empire. The honorable member pleaded poverty, and said, "Look at the position in which we are placed! The total amount of our credit on every account is £228,000." It is his duty, if he takes office, to see what the state of the finances is, and to provide for the future. We left him fully in funds, with ample securities to pledge. There was also a stated agreement with the bank to borrow money. We left him power to raise £500,000, which is not touched at the present time, and he has now got a considerable sum, by his own confession, to the credit of those accounts. I may here refer to the statement of the bank account produced by the Colonial Treasurer. He states that there is a debit balance in London of £60,000. I say that there is no such thing as that debit balance. If the Imperial guaranteed debentures are brought to account, we have money in London to pay the whole interest and necessary expenditure there up to the 15th January next. He made a great point that the consolidated revenue had no chance of paying back £300,000. That was fairly explained by the late Colonial Treasurer. The Consolidated Fund showed at the end of the last financial year that, when the fund is in credit, at the end of the year, it would bear that sum as it ought to do; so that completely proved that there is no deficiency there. Then the honorable gentleman read a memorandum from the Treasury, stating that £325,000 would have to be paid in London in February. We are perfectly aware of that, and we provided ample funds in London to meet that payment. Honorable gentlemen on those benches must understand that we have been some time in session now, and from what we see I think it is probable the session is only beginning. That being the case, those honorable gentlemen must not think that they are to sit there quietly and allow the money to run short. They must be prepared, even during the sitting of this Assembly, to look to their Ways and Means to provide funds for carrying on public works. The money we left will not last for ever, and the Government must be careful that they do not run short. However, they seem to make a very feeble attempt to provide the funds that are necessary. The honorable gentleman spoke of the Inscription of Stock Bill, and said that they were opposed to secret borrowing. Now, what we proposed to do with the Inscription of Stock Bill was this: to take power to inscribe all our stock, and to take power to inscribe the £800,000 of Treasury bills. There is no need for that to be put into a loan: it is part of the debt of the colony, and it is so shown. By this means we proposed, as the stock became inscribed, to gradually release the Sinking Fund, and by the increase in railway returns we should have sufficient next year to make our expenditure come within our income, and pay the amount charged on the Consolidated Fund for education as well, which has hitherto been charged to the Land Fund. That was why we had no idea of stating any special finance further than this year. Without such a robbery as the honorable gentleman proposes with regard to the Land Fund of Otago and Canterbury, we were prepared to show next year that by the decrease in expenditure, by the release of the Sinking Fund, and by the increase of the railway returns, there would have been amply sufficient funds to meet all our expenditure. It was very hard for those who, like myself, had no care to take office, to be held up throughout the southern provinces as members who were agreeing to perpetrate a robbery of the Land Fund, when the reverse was the case, as would be seen by the late Government making it a question of life and death to them. Where now are those men who professed that they would sacrifice everything rather than consent to the Land Fund being taken? I shall make those honorable gentlemen go into the lobby and show who are about to perpetrate this robbery, and show the people of Otago which of us have hitherto been their honest and earnest friends. I fail to see that even the ingenuity of the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) will be sufficient to convince the people of Otago that white is black. He will not be able to gull the people of Otago, and to persuade them to make such a sacrifice by saying that the state of the colony is such that the Land Fund must be taken. What was the meaning of all the statements which appeared in "own correspondents'" letters throughout the colony—which statements were no doubt prompted—that there were going to be great discrepancies shown in the finance of the late Government, and that the colony was in such a state that it must be saved in some way? We all knew what that meant. It was all done with the object of enabling those honorable gentlemen to seize on the Land Fund. That was to be their excuse. I am sorry to see the senior member for Dunedin City (Mr. Macandrew) agreeing to such a proposal. I expected that he would stand up manfully in the Cabinet and not allow this robbery to be committed. This is a case in which the people of the Southern Island are being robbed by their friends, and not by their enemies. It was well put by the Native Minister, who said, "Gentlemen, we are respectable highwaymen. We take the Land Fund openly." The Postmaster-General used to speak very strongly on this subject when he was on the Opposition benches. He got up on one occasion, and was scarcely able to talk with rage. The honorable gentleman got so red that I was afraid he would fall down in an apoplectic fit, and denounced the Government strongly for taking any of the Land Fund. Now, let him tell us what he is going to do. I will show him what he is going to do. The revenue from land sales for the first quarter of the financial year in Canterbury amounted to £480,000. That was for the first quarter of the year. I suppose it is a fair calculation to make that during the remaining nine months the total revenue will be equal to the amount collected in the one quarter. That would give a total for land sales in Canterbury of nearly one million. Now, let us take the proposal made by the Government. I put the most liberal construction upon their proposal. I have not yet learnt whether they propose to give the 20 per cent. before any charges are put on it. I will give them the benefit of the doubt, and say that they will give the 20 per cent. before any charges are placed on the Land Fund. Then I will even add the charges hitherto placed on the Land Fund, and that will make in round numbers about £300,000. That will be £700,000 which it is proposed to launch into the coffers of the colony from the people of Canterbury. That would be the effect of these gentlemen's proposals were they to date them from the 30th of June last. If from the 1st January next, of course the amount would probably be less. But does the honorable gentleman think that, if these sales take place, those trustworthy farmers for whom he says he has so much respect, and who hold him in such esteem that they have sent him up to this House, will, for the sake of sentiment, be pleased to give up £700,000? Does he think that sentiment will cause them to permit their land to be pilfered by gentleman highway-robbers? Now, I will show how it may affect Otago. Some of the honorable gentlemen who come from Otago have been saying that the Land Fund of that district was short last year to the extent of £35,000. I will state the reason why the Land Fund was short to that amount. I will take the land sales of Otago for the nine months preceding the coming into operation of the Abolition Act. During that period the land which was sold realized nearly £300,000. Perhaps the honorable gentleman does not know that in Otago the lands have to be declared into hundreds and surveyed before they are sold; and the result was that, when Abolition became law, there was very little surveyed land left. No wonder, then, that they were short £35,000 in their Land Fund. We put down the amount which we expected would be realized by the sale of land in Otago this year at £200,000, and, considering the trouble which the Waste Lands Board is now taking to open up a large area of land for settlement, I have no hesitation in saying, no matter what the Colonial Treasurer may think, that the amount realized can be made much nearer £300,000. That amount could be obtained without any difficulty whatever, and without being detrimental to settlement. If the land is open for selection, and is sold to bond fide settlers, in fair-sized sections, £300,000 may easily be obtained for it. Suppose we take the calculation of the honorable gentlemen themselves. We will suppose that the land will realize £200,000: then by the proposals of the late Government there would be £112,000 to divide amongst the counties; but, if it should realize £300,000, then there would be over £200,000 to divide amongst the counties. Now, what is the position under the proposal of the present Government? If you take 20 per cent. off the £300,000, that will be £60,000 for the counties and £240,000 to go into the colonial coffers; but supposing it only realizes £200,000, then out of that sum the distribution to counties and Road Boards would only be £40,000. The difference you have to divide amongst the counties, as compared with the amount you would have under the proposals of the late Government, would be to the detriment of Otago, supposing the sales realize £300,000, about £150,000, and under the £200,000 about £70,000—consequently that much less to divide amongst the counties and Road Boards. Depend upon it the people of Otago will not be robbed of that with impunity. The late Government had no doubt that in Otago, as in every other provincial district, the land would realize the amount which was calculated upon by them. The amount realized for the first quarter, in comparison with that estimated, from the land sales in Auckland was certainly small, but it would be very easy to put in the market the Patutahi and a few other blocks to swell the amount. In Otago there is a large quantity of land which has not yet been opened to the public, and the Land Fund there is likely to be very high for years—very much higher, in fact, than in any other part of the colony. Sir, if these lands are to be all sacrificed, and put into the common pot by those honorable gentlemen, I shall deeply regret it. I think the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Macandrew) will no doubt find that the people of Otago will consider that he has something of some importance to answer for. I do not think that he will find himself to be that popular gentleman which he once was: in fact, the representatives of the two provinces will not, I fancy, be so highly thought of by their constituents in future. The Hon. the Native Minister the other day told us that the Government were quite ready to go to the country on this question. Well, I dare say most of the northern members are willing to do the same; but let us see what the South will say to it. I am very sorry that the honorable gentlemen who come from Otago did not, like their predecessors, hold firmly to the Financial Arrangements Act, which bestowed the Land Fund on the provinces. I dare say it is true, as the Native Minister has said, that any honorable gentleman who takes a seat on those benches must carry out the policy which they have shadowed forth. I suppose it must be carried out. I believe no honorable gentlemen could now hold their places on those benches who did not carry out that policy; and representatives in the Government from Canterbury and Otago are entirely responsible for that state of matters. I am sorry to see honorable gentlemen like Mr. Stout and the other members for Otago consenting to the perpetration of this robbery of their own province. I am sorry that, for party purposes, they should agree to that. Now, Sir, the Premier has said that no provision was made to meet the provincial liabilities; but if he had looked into the matter at all he must know perfectly well that, of the loan which was obtained from the colonial banks, £250,000 was placed to the credit of the Provincial Liabilities Account, and to that amount they are wiped off. If that had not been done, where would the money which had been already paid on account of provincial liabilities be? Then, again, a further sum of £250,000 was provided out of the two million loan which we proposed to raise. If the present Government choose to put all sorts of charges on the provincial liabilities, I cannot say what amount will have to be provided. All I can say is that we amply provided for all necessary sums. There is no necessity whatever for putting so many charges on provincial liabilities. Then, in answer to my late colleague, the Premier stated that in 1854 the Assembly was compelled to give reasons for seeking representative government. I am extremely sorry that the honorable gentleman should make such an excuse for his misdeeds. There was no need for the Assembly to give any such reasons: The honorable gentleman has also said that he was at one time hated by men, who, however, had now ceased to persecute him. Well, Sir, that is the cry of "Pity the sorrows of a poor old man." It finds no favour in the House, having now got so completely used to it, and I hope the day will soon come when it will find no favour in the country. All that my late colleague stated was, that when the honorable gentleman had the management of the affairs of the country in his own hands those affairs were not too well managed; and that statement is fully borne out by the resolution of the Assembly that he read, and it was made in answer to an assertion by the Premier—for it is mere assertion—that the late Government have mismanaged the finances of the colony, and that everything is in a state of chaos. The late Colonial Treasurer has compared his conduct with that of the Premier. He has shown that that honorable gentleman, when he managed the affairs of the colony according to his own will, not being responsible to a General Assembly for his acts, did not succeed to the satisfaction of the colony. If this House now agrees to a proposal it becomes responsible for it as well as the Government. The honorable gentleman said that he has met with thirty-seven years of antagonism, and that now those who have been opposed to him regret that they have been opposed to him. He says all he cares for now is to put the finances of the country on a good footing; but I am sure that, if New Zealand has to wait until that honorable gentleman puts the finances on a firm footing, it will have to wait for a long time indeed. I may say for myself that I would not at all mind that honorable gentleman having the control of the affairs of New Zealand for a year, for then, I believe, he would show his utter incapacity in his old days to govern the country. It does not do for a Rip Van Winkle to come forward for the purpose of taking charge of the affairs of a colony inhabited as this is by a very energetic and enterprising people. The man who undertakes that duty must not have lain dormant for a number of years and hidden himself on an island far away from the people. Such a man must not think that he can come out and take up the same position that he held before he retired to his island home. Things have greatly changed since the honorable gentleman went into retirement, and he could not assume the position he once held. It is not easy for a man who is absent only for a year to come back and pick up the thread of affairs. He said he was going to extricate the country from its embarrassment, and to free the people. I have no doubt that he can relieve the country of its embarrassment by perpetrating a robbery on the Middle Island, an operation not needed and quite uncalled for. I utterly repudiate the idea that there was any embarrassment; but, even were it so, what has that to do with freeing the people? I do not know a freer people than the people of New Zealand; and of this I am sure: that, for every poor, unfortunate man in New Zealand, you will find ten in any of the neighbouring colonies. In this colony any man who can work can earn a living. There may be a time in the winter when work is scarce, but if a man is careful he can gather together sufficient in the summer-time to render him almost independent of work during the winter months. Then the honorable gentleman went on further to object to our finance, and said we had financed for the benefit of our friends. That is another of the wild statements he is in the habit of making. I do not for a moment believe that the country gives credit to such assertions. They are most unfounded, and I hurl them back with contempt. We have done nothing for our friends; but I should not be surprised if the present Government, after they have been a year in office, are not found so clean-handed as they at present profess to be. From what one can now gather, I have no doubt whatever they will assist their friends. I also deny his statement that we have made railways and roads for the benefit of our friends. Let him point out any particular case, or any portion of the colony, in which a road or a railway has been made for the benefit of our friends. The railways are all passed by this House, and this House becomes responsible for them. He followed that up by saying that the artisans were taxed to make roads for the friends of the late Ministers. I would like to know where there is a road that has been made out of Customs revenue. The Consolidated Fund is scarcely sufficient to meet the ordinary demands made upon it, and it is quite out of the question that a portion of it should be diverted for the purpose of making roads. Where, then, is the truth of the honorable gentleman's statement? Then the honorable gentleman took exception to our estimate of the provincial liabilities. I can say this: that nothing was brought before the House by the late Government until it had been debated in Cabinet, and in matters like the provincial liabilities each item would be carefully debated. These provincial liabilities which the honorable gentleman spoke of were never brought before the Cabinet, and therefore they cannot be treated as those of the late Government. It appears that these gentlemen took up the list which the Minister for Public Works had made of the applications for works, and that they noted it down as the proposals of the late Government. The members of the late Government, with the exception of one, never saw it. Such a proposal would never have been brought down until every single item had been discussed. It had not been discussed, and I disclaim any responsibility for that list. The honorable gentleman then went on to say that the House must vote them a lump sum to expend as they pleased. I should require to have very great confidence in any Ministry before I could agree to such a proposal, and, as I have no confidence whatever in those gentlemen, I can never vote for such a thing. If I were a member of the Government I should never have the assurance to ask for such a thing. It is a monstrous proposal, and I hope the House will not agree to it. The honorable gentleman always pleads for time. He now wants time to extricate New Zealand from her difficulties. Sir, I believe he will come down next session with exactly the same plan. When he was on the Opposition benches he wanted to take £350,000 or £400,000 off the Customs revenue, and raise that sum by means of direct taxation, and he was to do it all in half-an-hour. But he never calculated that that would be something like 3s. in the pound all over the colony. Where is the Government that dare make such a proposal? And, if it were proposed and carried, I am sure the people would not be able to pay such a tax. I quite agree that the incidence of taxation must be considered in some way; but I do not see any prospect of that question being considered if those gentlemen remain on those benches, although the honorable member for Akaroa made such a vigorous declamation that that policy would ring from end to end of the land; and the honorable member for Dunedin City said he wanted all party feeling put aside in order that this great question might be considered and agreed to. If the finances are to be changed in such a manner as that, the honorable gentlemen on that side will get the colony into such a mess that it will be most difficult for competent men to get it clear again. The honorable gentleman at the head of the Government made great sport of what was said about his colleague the Colonial Treasurer in reference to the report of the Railway Management Committee. The Colonial Treasurer was a member of that Committee, and must have known what the Committee proposed to recommend. He could not have been ignorant of the nature of that report. Then he went on to talk about raising a loan in a close market, and made use of certain expressions of which he ought to be ashamed. I do not think it was worthy of the Premier to make such a statement as he made. Should loans be floated in the colony, they are floated in a public way. Our debentures are offered to tender, and it does not matter where or how they are purchased. There is no secreting of information. From the statements laid before this House, and which are to be seen either in Melbourne, Sydney, or London, our full indebtedness may be discovered at any time. The statements most likely to damage our credit are statements such as those contained in the Financial Statement now before us. We find the Treasurer setting down the estimated revenue as £3,690,026, the expenditure at £4,410,238; and the deficiency is declared to be £711,212, the amount he is to get by the confiscation of the Land Fund of Otago and Canterbury not being shown. How is that deficiency made up? It is made up by charging in the account of ordinary expenditure £661,024 for provincial liabilities. Who ever, throughout the colony, would expect that the indebtedness of the provinces should be paid out of the consolidated revenue? The liabilities of the provinces must be paid out of loan, and cannot be paid by any other means. We cannot afford to pay them out of the consolidated revenue, and it was never intended or proposed to do so, and to put such an item as provincial liabilities in a statement of our ordinary expenditure is to adopt a course calculated to damn our credit. It is injuring our credit in every way, and if that statement goes forth to the London money market the Government will never raise the four million loan. There will be a repetition of what took place in respect to the Otago loans when 6 per cent. debentures sold at 75 per cent. with somewhat of accrued interest as well. It is to the benefit of some gentlemen who deal in bonds to cry down debentures of a colony whose credit has suffered, so as to buy them up cheaply. These bonds are only bought by a small number of people. It is their interest to decry our credit. This is what is called bearing our securities—and those honorable gentlemen are helping them to do that—so that they may buy the debentures at a cheap rate, and afterwards, when our credit recovers, sell them at a large profit. If those honorable gentlemen endeavour to face the London money market for a four million loan at present, they will fail, and the result will be that they will be going down to Otago and sacrificing our land in very large blocks in order to get the colony out of difficulties. That is what they will resort to. I warn those honorable gentlemen that it is not by any means necessary for them to ask for a four million loan, and by asking for that loan they damage our credit, they damage themselves, and they will not be able to get the money. Then the honorable gentleman was very funny about the telegrams that went Home to England. He said they were put into the papers, and that the Colonial Treasurer chuckled at how he gulled the people of England. But the people of England are not so easily gulled. Those who invest in our debentures are not so easily gulled, for they will sift any statement made, and the gentlemen of the Stock Exchange are perfectly capable of pulling a Statement to pieces, of seeing how the revenue and expenditure stand, and whether we are in a solvent state or not. The honorable gentlemen need not fear that they are likely to be gulled. The honorable gentleman then said that I stated the other day that he should not make known to the colony that there were railway claims against the Government to the amount of £170,000. I said nothing of the sort. What I said was that he had no right to count that £170,000 as part of our liabilities, and he had no right to count it as a deficiency in our accounts, but only as a contingent liability. He states that the first claim sent before the Committee was paid in full; but the Committee might have been got round in an easy manner. They only take half the evidence. They take ex parte statements, never seek for other evidence, and then they bring down a report recommending that the money be paid. The Public Petitions Committee is so deluged with petitions that it is not able to properly investigate claims. These claims should be investigated by people who are able to sift them thoroughly. I should be very sorry to see these claims brought before a Committee of the House, claims amounting to £170,000, and dealt with rudely in that way. I never found fault with the honorable gentleman for stating that the claims existed, but I did find fault with him for stating that they were a deficiency upon our account. I am satisfied, from the papers I have looked through, that if we get fair-play these claims will not have to be met; and we have no right to take them into account. If they are to be taken into account they must be paid out of loan, being on account of railway contracts, which have all been constructed out of loan, and, if these have to be paid, why should they be treated differently? I have already referred to what the honorable gentleman stated about the cash balance. My honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer merely stated what was the fact—namely, that the amount of the guaranteed debentures in London were left there as cash, and would only be borrowed on to meet the exigencies of the colony. If they borrowed money, and put it to the credit of the account, instead of it being £60,000 in debt it would show nearly £300,000 to its credit. That is what we reckoned on as being the sum on hand when we left office. The honorable member for Auckland City East says "No." Perhaps he knows better than I do. Probably, as the honorable gentleman had the entrée to the offices, and has examined the books—

Mr. REES.—If the honorable gentleman is alluding to me, I may inform him that I have not the entrée to the offices, nor have I seen any of the books.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable gentleman said "No" so pointedly that I thought he must have informed himself, in order to be able to contradict me so flatly.

Mr. REES.—I got the information from the papers in this House and from the published Statements.

Mr. McLEAN.—I say the honorable gentleman is wrong. He could not possibly know what amount of these guaranteed debentures were borrowed upon and placed to the credit of our bank account in London. No paper laid upon the table of this House shows that. The Statement does not show how much cash balance there is in London. That is, all that my honorable friend said was in the way of misleading the House. Then the honorable gentleman stated that we had no surplus of £148,000 last year—that we were deficient. Now, any honorable gentleman looking at this account will easily see that there was a surplus last year; and the present Colonial Treasurer has brought down that surplus at the head of this Statement, thereby acknowledging that there was a surplus last year. We have the Colonial Treasurer stating that there was a surplus from last year of £148,000; and we have the Premier, who knows nothing at all about it, stating that there was no surplus. Such contradictory statements as those, coming from two honorable members on the Government benches, it will be difficult for the country to understand. I now come to the chief item for which a loan is required. The Colonial Treasurer puts it thus: "Public works—amount to be raised on account of current year, £1,461,447." That is far in excess of what we proposed. The honorable gentleman in bringing forward his finances should be careful that he is able to get the money before he spends it, and he would do well if he reduced that item by a considerable amount—if he would reduce it to the amount we placed on the Estimates, which is quite sufficient for the departments to spend during the year. Then the next item is, "Treasury bills to be converted, £832,000." Now, these Treasury bills are not due. They can be held over for any time: they can be, and a good many of them are, invested in such a way that they do not become due for a long time to come. There is no hurry about finding money for them. Then he proposes to borrow money to pay the "Debt due to Public Works Account by Consolidated Fund, £300,000." That is a case in which he proposes to borrow money to make up a deficiency. There is no deficiency in the Consolidated Fund. I say that at the end of the year the Consolidated Fund will be perfectly able to meet that £300,000. (No, no.) Honorable members may say "No," I say Yes. The next item is, "Imperial Guaranteed Debentures to be redeemed, £800,000." We had provided for this in the two million loan that we were to raise. Then, with regard to the provincial liabilities, how can he have them in two places? He proposes to pay them as part of the ordinary expenditure. I presume, as he has not shown the amount he is to obtain from the seizure of the Land Fund, he means to put the one against the other. On the other hand, he proposes to borrow the money. He cannot do both. It would have been as well had he struck them out of the expenditure altogether, and placed them in their proper place, in the proposed loan, and not attempted to use them so as to show that the colony was exceeding its expenditure over revenue by £1,926 a day. I really cannot understand how the honorable gentleman could make such an assertion. I am inclined to think, with my honorable friend the late Colonial Treasurer, that the Statement was the Hon. the Premier's handiwork. I believe the Colonial Treasurer did not make up that Statement himself. When he uses the provincial liabilities to make up a deficit, and to show the country that we are living beyond our means, it is done purposely, and with the sole object of taking the Land Fund of the Middle Island. Their object in saying that the finances of the late Government were in such a mess is that they may justify themselves down South in taking the Land Fund. But, Sir, they will not be able to throw dust in the people's eyes in that way. The people there will be able to pull this Statement to pieces. There are many persons in the South who will take the trouble to do so, and they will take the Estimates of the late Government and those of the present Government, and compare them for themselves. They will place the matter before the public in its proper light, notwithstanding that the Press down South is pretty well in the hands of the honorable gentlemen opposite—in the interest of that party. I am sorry to say that the statements which have appeared in a leading paper in Dunedin are absolutely incorrect. Statements were set forth in that paper in order to mislead the people of New Zealand. The honorable member for Dunedin City I believe to be responsible for many of them.

Mr. STOUT.—I say the honorable member is stating what is absolutely untrue.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member for Port Chalmers says "Hear, hear." I do not wonder, seeing how that honorable gentleman has acted. He is like the kangaroo-rat—he hops from side to side. On one night he sits on one side of the rail, and the next night on the other; and no doubt he means to take another political somersault this session yet, and land on the other side. The honorable gentleman is so fond of that, that I really do not know on which side of the House we shall find him presently. I hope, for his own sake, that he will take care of himself, and that when it comes to a vote he will array himself against those who dare to bring forward such a proposal as this. I can assure him that if he does not do so he may hear of it hereafter. I have stated to the House the position in regard to the Land Fund. I have plainly shown the state in which the finances were left by the late Government. I mean to say that next year, by the release of the Sinking Fund under the inscription of stock, and by the increase of railway revenue, we should be in a position, even after putting education as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, to relieve the Land Fund of that charge, and we should have been able to balance our accounts, and by a further reduction of our expenditure, before next year, bring our expenditure within our income. What will be the effect of taking this Land Fund? It will simply be to bring the proceeds of sales of land into this House to be scrambled for, and to be spent all over the colony. How much better would it be to leave those funds in the hands of the County Councils or Road Boards! How much better would they spend the money than we shall be able to do! The great object of the late Government when Abolition was brought about was that all those works should be kept out of this House. It was thought that, by throwing them on the County Councils and Road Boards, and keeping them out of this House, and placing the powers gradually on those bodies as they were able to take them, we should clear this House of a large amount of the small legislation we previously had to pass, and should thus be able to shorten the session to about two months. That was the view the Government had. But, if we are to take the Land Fund into this House to be scrambled for all over the colony, I warn those honorable gentlemen that, instead of a two months' session, they will be sitting here all the year round. Great difficulty will be experienced in getting good men to come here for a whole year. New Zealand is not situated as Melbourne or Sydney is, where members can get into a railway carriage, go to their homes for a few days, and then return to their Parliamentary duties. Here it is a matter of considerable thought with a member before he goes to visit his home; and, besides, when he gets there he cannot return in a day, while he will not know what may be going on in the House in his absence. I am one of those who always appear here on the first day of the session; I appear in the House day after day, and never leave till the last day of the session; but I should not like to come here and stay even for six months in the year, and I should think seriously before making my appearance in this House if that were likely to be the case. I think it would be an advantage both to members themselves and to the country at large if the duration of the session were shortened. It has been the power of tongue only that has kept the Government in office against a majority of this House. The great power of tongue, kept up incessantly, has delayed the work of the session. Those gentlemen who formed the Middle Party and joined the members of the extreme side of the House did so with the view of conciliating those gentlemen and stopping the incessant talk; and I do wish those honorable members had succeeded in forming a Government. Much has been said about the eagerness of my late colleagues for office. I say there is no eagerness on their part for office. I was surprised at the insulting manner in which the Premier spoke of my honorable friend the member for Egmont when he said he was hungering for office in order that he might draw his month's pay. Sir, that honorable gentleman has higher principles than a desire for pay, and, having been a colleague of his, I venture to say that a more straightforward, honest man has never been on those benches; and I challenge the Premier, after he has been in office as long as my honorable friend was, to come out as clean as he did. I never knew my late colleague to propose anything but what the whole country might hear of, and the Premier ought not to cast a slur upon him by saying that he is hungry for office and for pay. There are not any members of the late Government who hunger for pay. They are quite able to do without office, and can do without pay perfectly well. So far as I myself was concerned, I never sought office. I joined the Government simply because Otago was unrepresented in it at the time, and in order that injustice might not be done to the place from which I come. I had no eagerness for office, and, as my late colleagues know, I was anxious, whenever an opportunity offered, to retire from office, and to give up my seat whenever they could obtain a representative from Otago. I do not want office. I have no desire to return to those benches. I think I have had enough of office. I have done my duty honestly by my province; I have looked after its interests consistently with the interests of the whole of the colony. I know that of late years any representative from Otago who joined the Government would be regarded as inconsistent, and held up as a traitor and Centralist by those who are now taking the Land Fund. The people will now see who are the real Centralists. I hope, however, the Ministry will still think over the course they propose, and will retrace their steps, if it is not too late. The Native Minister exultingly said that, now that these proposals have once been put forward, whoever goes on the Government benches would not be able to draw back. I believe the honorable gentleman was right. Considering the state of this House, I do not believe that any honorable gentlemen departing from this principle would obtain seats on those benches:

but for that state of matters we have to thank those gentlemen whom Otago had every right to look to as protectors: on them alone the sole responsibility rests. There is one matter to which I wish to refer, with regard to one of the cries which the Government have adopted, or rather countenanced, in order to keep on those benches, and that is the answer which the Premier gave to the honorable member for Timaru in reference to statements that have been made by correspondents in the newspapers regarding obstructions offered by Civil servants to the Government, and the difficulty Ministers had in getting information. It is pitiable to see the members of the Government countenancing such statements, more especially the Premier, the ever-persecuted gentleman, for the purpose of getting the country's sympathy with them. The statement was put forth, and I saw it referred to in a letter to the newspapers in Dunedin, and commented on by the organ of the Government, the Otago Daily Times. It was stated in that letter that the Sub-Treasurer was the brother-in-law of the late Premier, and he was a cause of obstruction. He is in no way connected with the late Premier, and I venture to say, from my experience of that officer, that he cares very little who is in office. I am convinced that he has no feeling in regard to the occupants of the Treasury benches, and I am certain that, if the Premier knew how damaging that statement is to men who cannot come forward and defend themselves, and who cannot write to the newspapers, he would hesitate before allowing it to go forth. However, the country will be able to judge gentlemen who keep in office by having recourse to such statements. The Civil servants ought to have no great love for me. Probably I was harder upon them than other Ministers, because I have been accustomed to discipline, and I have endeavoured to instil the necessity of discipline into the service; but I never found any one of those officers who would not take any trouble to give me information. During my whole tenure of office I never experienced any difficulty in getting information. I could go from office to office, and every one would endeavour to give me all the information I desired. I am perfectly sure that, if the honorable gentlemen on those benches stated the truth, they would say that they have never been thwarted in getting information, but that every facility has been afforded them. Many of those gentlemen have been under successive Ministries, and even a whisper of such a thing has never been heard before. I hope that some of those honorable gentlemen will take an opportunity of retracting these statements, which have been so studiously circulated to the detriment of those officers. I should not care about it if they were able to defend themselves, or to write letters to the newspapers in denial of the statements made regarding them; but they cannot do that.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. McLEAN.—If when I was in office I had found any of those gentlemen writing to the newspapers I would have dealt summarily with them. I see that the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Stout) is very anxious to speak, and to justify his action, as he usually does, by showing to the people of Dunedin that black is white and white is black. I will therefore not detain the House any further.

On the motion of Mr. WASON, the debate was adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 21st November, 1877.

First Readings—Second Reading—Third Readings—Strath Taieri and Clyde Railway—Waikouaiti Harbour Bill — Waikouaiti Athenaeum Bill — Crown Redress Bill No. 2—Otago Museum Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Cemeteries Bill, Marine Bill.

SECOND READING.

Walsh and Others Pension Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

STRATH TAIERI AND CLYDE RAILWAY.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL asked the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, Whether a report which has appeared in the newspapers is correct, that a reserve of about 370,000 acres has been made in Otago in connection with the proposed Strath Taieri Railway? There had been an understanding in another case that reserves should not be made without the consent of Parliament.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the lands referred to were at present held under pastoral lease. They were not open for sale, but had been indicated by the Survey Department as being suitable lands to be set aside for the construction of the Strath Taieri Railway, if reserves were ever required for that purpose. No reserve had been made, pending the Railway Bill becoming law.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL asked if the honorable gentleman could give the same assurance to the Council as he had previously given in a similar case—namely, that no reserve would be made without the knowledge of Parliament.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said that in this case there was a Bill coming before Parliament, and consequently it was not in the same category as the case about which the honorable gentleman asked him on a former occasion.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL asked if the Council was to understand that unless the Bill passed the reserve would not be made.

WAIKOUAITI HARBOUR BILL.

The Hon. Captain FRASER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it would be in the recollection of honorable gentlemen that last session the Council gave a very handsome endowment to the Oamaru Harbour Board because it was shown that that body had no money, and that there were works in course of construction which, if they were not finished or looked after, would not only be seriously injured, but destroyed altogether. That was exactly the position of the Waikouaiti Harbour at the present moment. It was a small harbour about thirteen miles from Port Chalmers, and forty miles from Oamaru, situated at the mouth of the River Waikouaiti. It was a bar harbour, and inside the bar there was a very nice little basin, which was the resort of small craft trading to Dunedin and Port Chalmers. Since 1874 there had been a large expenditure incurred in the erection of jetties and in the construction of a sea-wall to increase the scour and, if possible, deepen the harbour. There had also been a very expensive branch road made from the main trunk road to the harbour. It ran along the outer edge of a swamp, and was liable to be washed away by the tide; so that constant expenditure was required upon it, and he had been told by the promoter of this Bill that a sum of £200 had been placed on the Estimates for repairing the road. He held in his hand a telegram from the local engineer, in which he stated that the total expenditure on the Waikouaiti Harbour works since June, 1874, had been £3,955 16s. 6d., which did not include the cost of the road. This harbour was not a port of entry, therefore he was not in a position to state the amount of exports and imports. It was proposed in the Bill to give an endowment to the harbour of 10,000 acres. He hoped honorable members would allow the Bill to be read a second time. These works, if not looked after, would simply be ruined, and would merely serve "to point a moral and adorn a tale," proving the blighting influence of Centralism. With regard to the constitution of the Harbour Board, he thought the provision in the Bill was a mistake, and when in Committee he proposed to alter it. At present the proposal was to place the harbour and the expenditure of money in the hands of the whole human race of Waikouaiti, for the words were, "the Chairman, County Council, and inhabitants of Waikouaiti." He would propose to substitute the Chairman of the County, ex officio, the Mayor of West Hawkesbury, ex officio, the Mayor of Palmerston, ex officio, Mr. Henry Ormond, and Mr. Duncan. The latter two gentlemen were the largest producers in the district, and they lived close to the harbour and took a great interest in the place. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said, although Waikouaiti was in his own district, where he would naturally be very glad to see public money expended, still, for the same reasons that had actuated him in opposing the endowment of the Riverton Harbour, he must object to this proposal. His honorable and gallant friend spoke about the pointing of a moral and the adorning of a tale; but, if the Council only knew how the tale should be told, the moral pointed by that tale would be that the Council should take care that it did not do the same thing itself. Although he lived in the district, he could not even say that he knew what the Harbour of Waikouaiti was. The use of the word "harbour" was to him a novelty, and he did not know what it was that could be called a harbour there. But the effect of continuing the silly expenditure which had been commenced, he would not say for political reasons, but certainly without due regard for the public interests in the case of the Waikouaiti River mouth, would be that such further expenditure would be thoroughly wasted. Without an enormous expenditure it would be useless to attempt the construction of the sea-wall, for it would simply be throwing money away. But there was a much more serious thing to be considered—namely, that the effect of spending a great deal of money on the construction of a harbour at the mouth of the River Waikouaiti, would necessarily be to take from the Government railway much of the traffic between Waikouaiti and Port Chalmers. So long as there was only a metalled road between Waikouaiti and Dunedin, and the produce had first to go to Dunedin by road and then to Port Chalmers by rail for shipment, there was an argument for public expenditure in this direction. But now that the railway was actually opened to Blueskin Bay, within a very short distance of Waikouaiti River, and would soon be opened to the Town of Waikouaiti, passing straight into Port Chalmers, there was no necessity for laying out money on the river. He could not understand anything more suicidal than to set up small harbours every few miles along the coast, for the purpose of sapping the traffic of the railways which it had cost the colony so much to construct. There was neither justice nor common sense in such a course. At any rate, as a person interested in the district in question, he could not consent to the proposal; but even if it were desirable to pass the second reading, it would be quite preposterous to place the expenditure of the money in the hands of the Chairman and County Council of Waikouaiti.

The Hon. Captain FRASER explained that he had proposed to alter the Bill in that respect.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL said that, apart from that consideration, he objected to the proposed endowment on the same ground that he had opposed the Riverton Harbour Bill.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE felt sure that the Hon. Captain Fraser's advocacy of this Bill was due more to his generous disposition than to any love for the proposal it contained, and that the honorable member had only taken charge of the Bill out of politeness to the gentleman whose name was at the head of it, and who, possibly, could find no other member so kindly disposed. He thought the promoter of the Bill in another place was a member of the late Government. Had that Government approved of the Bill it might have been brought forward with all the advantage of Government advocacy. But apparently they did not approve of it; neither did the present Government. Another Harbour Bill from the same part of the country was thrown out last year because it was close to another harbour. Now, Waikouaiti was very close to Port Chalmers. No less than £4,000 of public money had already been spent upon it, a great deal more money had been spent upon a road, and the colony had also constructed a railway which passed close to it. There was no reason that he could see why the Bill should go before a Select Committee, and he would move, That it be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Mr. NURSE would simply read the Hon. Captain Fraser's speech in opposing the Riverton Harbour Bill. By so doing he would be giving excellent reasons against the passing of this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL wished to know if the honorable gentleman would be in order in referring to a previous debate.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said the honorable gentleman would not be in order.

The Hon. Mr. NURSE said he would simply refer honorable gentlemen to the speech in Hansard.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said he was probably more intimately acquainted with Waikouaiti than any other honorable gentleman, but he regretted that he could not support the Bill. He supposed the railway would be running in a few weeks, and then, no doubt, nothing would be sent there by water. As the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell had explained, this could never be made a harbour. Besides, the amount of the produce was very small. It was very remarkable that, although he had several correspondents there, he had received no telegrams, letters, or anything about this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought that, inasmuch as the Colonial Secretary stated that the Hon. Captain Fraser was induced by feelings of good-nature to take charge of the Bill, it would be a very kind thing to extend the same good-nature to the honorable gentleman by relieving him of the charge as soon as possible. He knew Waikouaiti Harbour thirty years ago, and he supposed it had not improved since. At high tide a whaleboat could go in, but at low tide there was a danger of broaching-to on the bar. He experienced the pleasure of entering that harbour in company with his friend the late Mr. John Jones. He thought it might be possible to make something approaching to a harbour at Waikouaiti, which would last for a few months, by spending about as much money as England spent in making Portland Harbour.

The Hon. Captain FRASER thought it was a pity that the only two gentlemen interested in the place should take advantage of their local knowledge for the purpose of condemning the Bill. He had been connected with Waikouaiti since he first came to the colony. He believed that he was its first representative, and he asked the Hon. the Speaker to appoint the first Resident Magistrate there. The climate was so salubrious that at the age of eighty-one years that gentleman was still acting as Resident Magistrate. Honorable gentlemen in the Council did not know anything about Waikouaiti. It would some day be the Brighton of Otago. The air was most salubrious. There was a gentleman living there upwards of eighty years of age who had recently been made a father. It was a place to which many people might go who wished to renew their vitality. It was a very sad thing indeed that honorable gentlemen should destroy all that had been done by a paternal Provincial Government. It was very unfortunate for this Bill that he had had something to do with the throwing out of another Harbour Bill. But for that, he thought the Bill would have had a better chance.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be read a second time that day six months.

WAIKOUAITI ATHENÆUM BILL.

The Hon. Captain FRASER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, thought he need not dilate upon the advantages of athenæums, as that subject had been dwelt upon ad nauseam. He would only say that he knew of no place which required instruction, particularly political instruction, more than Waikouaiti. They were moderate in their request, and only asked for an endowment of fifty-three acres. In Committee he would add two other names as Trustees.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE had no objection to the Bill going to a Committee, but he wished to point out that in almost all other cases the endowments were transfers of lands already provincially reserved.

The Hon. Sir F. DILLON BELL was very glad in this case to be able to support the proposal. The inhabitants of Waikouaiti had gone to considerable expense and trouble to get together a small library, and to put up a very good building, which was a great source of enjoyment to people who wished to avoid the public-house. He thought it was a very good thing that the State should encourage such institutions in up-country townships by giving them a moderate amount of land.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. HART was surprised to learn that this Bill had been submitted to the Crown Law Officers and approved of, because he thought that they should have followed the example of New South Wales, which, so late as 1876, passed an Act complete in itself, and not at all so wide as this Act. As he understood it, the New South Wales Act did not give power to any plaintiff to sue the Government in the Resident Magistrate's Court, as this Bill proposed, nor did it give power in these wide terms: "unless the same shall be founded on or arise out of some contract, act, deed, matter, or thing done, executed, or entered into by or under the authority, express or implied, of Her Majesty's local Government in New Zealand." Under what might be called "implied authority" there was no end of questions which might be raised, and they would have an amount of litigation, to meet the expenses of which he thought a very considerable sum should be placed on the Estimates. They had actually seen at the last sitting of the Court of Appeal a question of £10, decided in the Resident Magistrate's Court, brought to the Supreme Court, and afterwards argued in the Court of Appeal. One of the Judges stated that there was no question of law or principle involved in the case, and yet such an amount of litigation was gone through concerning it. If they passed this Bill, they would see many similar cases of litigation. The only remedy that Parliament would have against such judgments was not to vote the moneys to meet them. But it would not be consistent with the honor of the colony that they should first encourage litigation and then refuse to pay the cost. They constantly found that, when the Government were the defendants, juries gave large damages against them. Again, the clauses of this Act did not dovetail with the Act of 1871, and this would put very considerable difficulty in the way of Judges as to what their duties might be under the Act. As he had said in the case of "The Debtors and Creditors Act, 1875," which was certainly an abortion, this was not an Act which they could safely pass, and it would open the door to litigation to an extent of which no member of the Council could be aware. He had spoken to one practitioner on the subject, Mr. George Cook, of Dunedin, who had perhaps as wide an experience as any practitioner in the colony, and he stated that this would be a very dangerous Act to pass. He moved, That it be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN said he moved the adjournment of the debate, upon the occasion when this Bill was proposed to be read a second time, for the reason that, except a few words which were said by the honorable gentleman representing the Government and some observations made by the Hon. Mr. Holmes, it appeared to him that a measure which in his opinion was one of very great importance was being allowed to pass its second reading, and the Council was being allowed to pledge itself to the policy of that measure, without honorable gentlemen having made themselves acquainted with the provisions of the Bill, or having been informed as to the present state of the law on the subject. The existing law upon this subject was contained in the Crown Redress Act which was passed in 1871, and which was to provide for the enforcement of claims against the Crown in New Zealand. It was introduced into the Council by the Hon. Mr. Sewell, who, amongst other things, said, "The object of the Bill was to afford a suitor the same redress against the Crown as he would have against a private individual. Under the present law no proceedings could be taken against the Crown, except with its own consent. It was the intention of the Government to retain that provision, as it was necessary for the purpose of protecting the State against innumerable and vexatious proceedings. The cases in which the Crown came into contact with the subject were so many that it was necessary to preserve that restriction." The Act defined the method of proceeding. It provided that the consent of the Governor was to be obtained as an initial step. That being had, the petition to the Governor, upon which his assent was given, was filed in the Supreme Court, and it became the first step in the process. Afterwards the case was conducted as in any other ordinary case, except that the Attorney-General had the power confided to him of changing the venue of the trial when the interests of the public appeared to render the step desirable. The Act provided that execution should issue upon the certificate given by the Registrar of the Court specifying the verdict and the amount of costs that were to be paid. The Act further provided that the Governor should satisfy the verdict of the Court out of any moneys voted by the General Assembly for that purpose. Clause 9 of the Act defined the character of the claims upon which proceedings should be taken. It said,—

"Nothing shall be deemed a claim or demand within the meaning of this Act unless the same shall be founded on and arise out of some contract entered into by the authority of Her Majesty's local Government in New Zealand, and no person shall be entitled by virtue of this Act to prosecute or enforce any claim against Her said Majesty in the nature of an action for specific relief for the performance of, nor any action for damages for the breach of, any contract for the purchase of waste or other lands of the Crown."

The proviso was passed in view of the fact that, inasmuch as the administration of the waste lands of the Crown was in the hands of the Provincial Government, it was not safe for the Crown to subject itself to actions upon contracts for dealing with the waste lands the responsibility for and full administration of which were not in their own hands. That Act followed the Victorian legislation. It was nearly a transcript of an Act which a short time previously had been passed by the Legislature of Victoria, except in this particular point: The Victorian Act made it incumbent upon the Treasurer at once to satisfy the judgment of the Court without appropriation by the Assembly, but the interests of the Crown were protected in this colony by the requirement that, before a judgment could be satisfied, money must be appropriated for the purpose by Parliament. It would be in the recollection of honorable gentlemen, no doubt, that a scandal arose in Victoria owing to the non-existence of that provision in the Crown Redress Act of that colony. For a long time there was a deadlock between the two Houses in that colony, arising out of what was known as the "Darling question;" and during all that time the financial business of the colony, and all expenditure on account of the establishments, were carried on by means of actions in the Supreme Court. Even when the clerks required their salaries they brought actions against the Crown in the Supreme Court, and judgments were satisfied by the Treasurer on the authority of their law. In order to avoid a danger of that kind in this colony provision was made that no judgment of the Court should be satisfied until an appropriation was made by Parliament for the purpose. In addition to the Act of 1871 there was passed the Contractors Arbitration Act, which made what was hoped would be a sufficient provision for satisfying claims which might arise between the Government and a contractor; and in the Public Works Act passed last year further provision was made for giving those persons dealing with the Crown an opportunity in all transactions of having an immediate and direct remedy against the Crown in the person of the Minister. Under these circumstances it would appear that a not insufficient provision had been made by the Legislature for the redress of all grievances that could reasonably be expected to arise between the Crown and the subject. That being the state of the law, this Bill proposed to amend the 2nd section of the Crown Redress Act, which required that the consent of the Governor should first be obtained before any legal proceedings could be taken against the Crown. The obtaining of such a consent he took to be, in almost all cases, a simple formality. The Governor in these cases meant the Government, and, as his honorable friend opposite on every occasion pointed out, the Government was always responsible for any advice given in a matter which would unjustly affect any subject of Her Majesty. The Bill now before the Council proposed that not the Supreme Court alone, but the District Court and the Resident Magistrate's Court should be open to these proceedings against the Crown; and, instead of the preliminary consent of the Governor being obtained for the institution of suits of that kind, they were to be instituted by the authority of a practising barrister of the Supreme Court, whose function it would be to state in writing under his hand that he considered the petitioner had a good cause of action, and that the same was disclosed in the said petition. He had a great respect for the legal profession as a body, but, seeing that in every case gentlemen of that profession would be found ready to lend their services to one side or to the other to defend the right or the wrong, as the case might be, he took it that the imposition of such a provision as that by way of protecting the public interests was neither more nor less than a sham. He had already read the 9th clause of the Act, which defined the cause of action upon which proceedings could be taken. He would now read the clause which was proposed to be substituted therefor. The 3rd section of this Bill said,—

"Section nine of the said 'Crown Redress Act, 1871,' shall be repealed, and this section shall be read in its place and stead: Nothing shall be deemed a claim or demand within the meaning of this Act, unless the same shall be founded on or arise out of some contract, act, deed, matter, or thing done, executed, or entered into by or under the authority, express or implied, of Her Majesty's local Government in New Zealand, or for which the said local Government would be responsible if they were private subjects of Her Majesty in New Zealand."

He would call the attention of the Council to the peculiar effect of this alteration of the word "and" for the word "or." The original Act proposed that the claim "shall be founded on and arise out of." This alteration opened a very wide door indeed to the constructive ingenuity of legal gentlemen. They were not told that any pressing occasion had arisen for an alteration of the existing law. The case which the honorable gentleman had quoted with reference to some iron taken out of a wrecked vessel was very capable of explanation, and could have been very easily settled, without recourse to law, upon very reasonable grounds and principles. At any rate, if it were as bad as the honorable gentleman represented, it would not be sufficient ground for such an alteration of the law as was herein proposed, and proposed not on behalf of the Government, not by the Crown itself through the medium of its responsible officers, but by a legal gentleman a private member in another place. What would happen, to his mind, under the provisions of this Bill, would be that, in addition to the Defence Office which, he was glad to think, was under the control of his honorable and gallant friend, there would be another Defence Office, of a different character, required against an enemy of a very different kind; and he ventured to think that out of that other Defence Office the Government would have infinitely more worry and trouble than arose out of the Defence Office in the sense in which it at present existed. If there were any grievance of a serious character which required redress, he would be one of the last to raise his voice against any reasonable measure being adopted for the purpose of obtaining that redress; but he most earnestly protested against the passing of a Bill of this kind, which, as he said on a former occasion, might properly be characterised as a Bill to promote litigation, and not a Bill to protect the subject from any wrongs that could be perpetrated against him by the Government of the colony. He thought he had shown that in the Crown Redress Act as it existed, in the Contractors Arbitration Act, and in the provisions of the Public Works Act, which subjected the Government to all the responsibilities of a common carrier, there were sufficient means of redress afforded to the subject for any possible wrongs which might be inflicted upon him. Behind all that, there was the General Assembly. The ears of gentlemen in either House were never closed against petitions for redress. He thought, therefore, that the evils, if any, which had arisen under such circumstances were as nothing compared with the evils of the worry and torment of incessant litigation to which the door would be opened in the colony if this Bill were passed. He was glad to find that his honorable and learned friend Mr. Hart was in accord with him in the view he took of this matter, and he supported with great pleasure the honorable gentleman's amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Mr. HALL said they always listened with respect and pleasure to the remarks of the Hon. Dr. Pollen, and he had even done so on the present occasion, because the honorable gentleman put his own side of the case very forcibly; but he had also listened to the honorable gentleman with very great regret indeed—regret that he had asked the Council to enable the Government to act in a manner which he (Mr. Hall) believed to be practically tyrannical. He would first, however, address himself to the remarks which fell from the Hon. Mr. Hart, who strongly objected to this Bill, but said that if it had been a measure like the Act which had recently been passed in New South Wales he would not have objected to it. He (Mr. Hall) would trouble the Council by pointing out what appeared to him to be the differences between this Bill and the Act of New South Wales. The alteration proposed to be effected by the present Bill had been very fairly described by the Hon. Dr. Pollen. That honorable gentleman told the Council—what everybody who had looked at the Bill must be aware of—that it was a measure extending the operation of the Act of 1871. It might be summarized in these few words: that, whereas the Act of 1871 only gave redress to the subject where he had a claim or demand arising out of a contract with the Crown, this Bill went further, and said that where the Crown had done an injury to a subject he might also claim redress and bring an action; that it should not merely be optional with the Crown to allow the subject to bring his action, but that, as a matter of right, he should be heard in a Court of justice, if he claimed to have a demand against the Crown, in the same way that he would be heard if he had a demand against a fellow-subject. The Bill, to his mind, did not go far enough. He was afraid it did not clearly give remedies in cases where injury had been done to the subject through the neglect of the Crown—through, for instance, the neglect of the Crown in the management of its railways, in which case a railway company would, of course, be liable. His honorable friend Mr. Hart stated that he would not object to this Bill if it were on the model of the New South Wales Act. He (Mr. Hall) frankly admitted that, having read the Act of New South Wales, he believed it was a better measure than this; but he thought he would be able to show to the Council that it was a far more sweeping and comprehensive measure, and laid the Crown far more widely open to actions than the Bill under consideration. He had said that the cases in which actions might be brought under this Bill might not include cases of neglect. Now, what did the Act of New South Wales, of which the Hon. Mr. Hart had spoken with so much respect, say? It said,—

“Any person having or deeming himself to have any just claim or demand whatever against the Government of this colony may set forth the same in a petition to the Governor praying him to appoint a nominal defendant in the matter of such petition; and the Governor, with the advice of the Executive Council, may, by notification in the Gazette, appoint any person resident in the colony to be a nominal defendant accordingly: Provided that, if within one month after presentation of such petition no such notification be made, the Colonial Treasurer for the time being shall be the nominal defendant.”

The Colonial Treasurer for the time being was the nominal defendant. Then the 3rd clause went on to say,—

“The petitioner may sue such nominal defendant at law or in equity in any competent Court, and every such case shall be commenced in the same way, and the proceedings and rights of parties therein shall, as nearly as possible, be the same, and judgment and costs shall follow or may be awarded on either side, as in an ordinary case between subject and subject.”

Next followed provisions as to the payment of costs. The Act provided,—

“The Colonial Treasurer shall pay all damages and costs adjudged against any such nominal defendant, or costs awarded against the Crown or Attorney-General under this Act, out of any moneys in his hands then legally applicable thereto.”

He agreed with the Hon. Dr. Pollen that there ought not to be a power in the Crown to pay any judgment against it except out of moneys appropriated by the General Assembly for that purpose, for the obvious reason that it might be abused as it was abused in the Colony of Victoria. This Bill accordingly provided that damages recovered against the Crown could only be paid out of moneys appropriated by the General Assembly, and it was not open to objection, therefore, on that score. He preferred the Act of New South Wales, because it was simpler in its wording, more full and comprehensive in its effect, and proceeded upon the broad principle that where there was a wrong there should be a remedy, whether that wrong was committed by the Crown or by a subject. He felt sure that was a principle which sooner or later must obtain in this country and in every country where the liberty of the subject was fairly protected. He could not help saying that the opposite principle, that a subject was not to have any remedy against the Crown for a wrong done to him, was the very basis of all despotism—that, in fact, it was the principle of despotic government. No sooner would the injustice to which this might lead be felt by the public generally—and the working of the railways by the Government would soon make it felt—than it would be such an intolerable grievance that of course it would have to be remedied. It was a very old-fashioned tale which they were now endeavouring to amend, that the Crown could not be sued. It had lasted, he supposed, from the time of William the Conqueror, or even earlier; but in those days the Crown was merely engaged in the government of the country, while now an entirely new state of things existed, and the Crown was doing the work of private individuals: it was constructing and working railways. If those railways were worked by a private company of course there would be a remedy against that company for any wrong that it committed, and why should there not be against the Government? It was often said that there was a prejudice against railway companies, and that in litigation they always came off badly; but was that a reason why the public should not have a remedy against railway companies at all? His honorable friend said that a remedy was given by the Public Works Act. That was where it was not given. It was true that they were liable as common carriers in case they lost a parcel; but if they set fire to a man's grain or his buildings they did not do that in their capacity as common carriers, and there was no redress. It had been urged that this, up to the present time, was a theoretic grievance—that there had been no cases of hardship. His honorable friend the Colonial Secretary had, however, pointed out a case of hardship. Upon that, the Hon. Dr. Pollen said that there were other modes of redress; but, in point of fact, they were only at the option of the Government. Now, with all regard to his honorable friend, he did not think it ought to be optional with the Crown, as a matter of fact with the Ministers of the day, and very often, in such cases, with the permanent heads of departments—it ought not to be left to them to say whether an individual who had suffered a wrong in a distant part of the colony should have redress or not; and he could not help saying that his honorable friend, notwithstanding all his excellent qualities, was one of the very last men to whom he would leave this option of saying whether redress should be afforded, because, as a rule, he took extreme views as to the rights and privileges of the Government. But there were other cases of actual hardship which had occurred. The Government had not been working the railways long, yet cases were cropping up every day, and it was a grievance which was felt in the part of the colony from which he came. He had had in his possession original documents from which he had quoted on a previous occasion in the Council, relating to a case in which a railway locomotive set fire to a fine crop of wheat and destroyed it, by which the farmer lost between £500 and £600. There was no doubt whatever about the facts, as everything was proved, and yet that man to this date had not obtained any redress, and could not do so. Now, did honorable members mean to say that that state of things ought to continue, or that it could continue? That man was entirely without any remedy, except such as he might get from what the Hon. Dr. Pollen called the liberality of Parliament. But had they not already enough to do in the Assembly without inviting petitions of this kind? and was it to depend upon a man's ability to procure powerful and zealous advocates in another branch of the Legislature whether he was to get redress for a wrong of this kind or not? The case he had referred to was not the only one. A case had been mentioned to him in which sparks were actually seen to go from an engine on to a building belonging to a private individual, near Christchurch. The building was destroyed, and the owner had been refused any kind of redress. He would not address the Council so strongly on this matter if he did not feel that a crying injustice existed. The Hon. Mr. Hart objected to the power to sue in the Resident Magistrate's Court. Of course, if it were thought proper, the claims could be decided by the Supreme Court only. When the claims were for small amounts that would probably be a hardship, and it might be possible to provide that, unless with the consent of the Government, a claim against the Government should not be heard except in the Supreme Court. But where the amount involved was not large it would be practically a denial of justice to insist that the case should be tried by the Supreme Court. If the Government thought that there was any attempt at imposition, or that any large principle was involved, it might be provided that it should be optional for the Government to have the case tried in the Supreme Court. He would not object to an amendment in that direction if he could obtain a real and substantial remedy. The case was a very simple one. His honorable friend had said that the Government were liable under the Public Works Act as common carriers, but he (Mr. Hall) had shown that they were not liable, and that there was no remedy where the subject suffered injuries of the kind he had referred to. In conclusion, he would only say again that, where the Government entered upon the work of a private company, and stepped out of the ordinary functions of Government to undertake operations in the course of which they might and did inflict, and could not help inflicting now and then, a wrong upon a subject, it was contrary to every principle of fairness and justice that the subject should not have an opportunity of having his grievance heard in a Court of justice; and, when this principle had been admitted in the neighbouring colonies—it had been admitted in Victoria, and, as he had shown, in the most ample manner in New South Wales—he trusted the Colony of New Zealand would not refuse to afford a simple remedy for what appeared to him to be a serious and very great wrong.

Sir F. DILLON BELL said his vote would depend on the answer which the Colonial Secretary would give to the question which he had put to him. If the honorable gentleman would consent that any action should be tried only in the Supreme Court, he would agree to the second reading of the Bill; but, if the honorable member wished actions to be tried in the inferior Courts, that would be a risk which he did not think it would be safe to run.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT, as a layman, expressed, with some diffidence, an opinion opposed to that of his honorable and learned friend Mr. Hart. It would be a very gross injustice for the strong to shut the door against the weak. A case had recently occurred, which had been referred to by the Hon. Mr. Hall, in which a farmer at Christchurch, who had suffered injury, brought his case before the Government, and was told that he could have no redress, although he had lost several hundreds of pounds. Was that fair, just, or honorable? He (Colonel Brett) knew what justice was. He might be ignorant of what was meant by legal justice, but he knew what military justice was. He had for thirty-three or thirty-four years, as the Hon. the Speaker could vouch, been accustomed to administer justice. All military men sat, about three times in every month, upon trials of men in their regiments and in the garrison for all sorts of crimes; and he thought he was as capable of judging as the Chief Justice himself. He did not see why justice should not be done to men in a low position of life, and objected to the door being shut against justice by such a powerful body as the Government. This was a very proper and just Bill, and he would support it.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON would like to ask the Hon. Mr. Hall whether, in the case he had mentioned of a crop of grain being destroyed by fire, the owner had taken any steps to obtain redress, and, if so, what course he had pursued.

The Hon. Mr. HALL said he applied to the Government for redress, but it was refused.

The Hon. Mr. G. R. JOHNSON asked if he had applied by petition.

The Hon. Mr. HALL believed he had also petitioned; but without success.

The Hon. Colonel WHITMORE said the arguments of the Hon. Mr. Hart were not so much against the principle of the Bill as against certain parts which might well be considered in Committee. For instance, the honorable gentleman objected to the Courts by which it was proposed that claims against the Government should be tried. There would be an opportunity in Committee for discussing that question, and, if the honorable gentleman would explain why the claimants should be debarred from making their claims before any competent Court, such as was proposed in this Bill, and also allowed in the New South Wales Act, he (Colonel Whitmore) would rather accept the Bill with the restriction mentioned by the Hon. Sir F. Dillon Bell, than that it should be thrown out altogether. Then the honorable gentleman objected that the Bill was not brought in by the Government. Certainly it had happened that it was not introduced by the Government, but the present Government had accepted it, and the previous Government had looked upon it with favour, so much so that the late Attorney-General had given his aid in Committee in altering and very materially improving the provisions of the Bill. Not only did a Crown Redress Act exist in New South Wales, but in Victoria also, where it was called the Crown Remedies Act; and, although the provisions in the latter colony were not quite so wide as in the case of New South Wales, still they were very much more liberal than the law at present in existence in New Zealand. There was a reason why the provisions of the New Zealand Crown Redress Act should be wider than those of Victoria. This colony was singular in respect to the large amount of private business done by its Government. It not only conducted railways; it also had a Public Trustee's Department, an insurance business, and post office savings banks—which last he supposed were common to all the colonies—and, what was singular, it had newspapers too, and only recently an action had been brought, by the permission of the Government, against a Government newspaper for libel. The subject in New Zealand, therefore, was brought much more into commercial relations with the Government than elsewhere, and would have very much greater grievances if he were debarred from the relief which the law ordinarily provided as between subject and subject. The New South Wales Act was not found to operate unjustly, nor was it contended that it had done so. If it could be shown, as he thought it could, that there were many more cases than the very glaring one he had adduced, of the "Kate Moynahan," in which injustice had been done to the subject in the colony through the immunity of the Crown, then there would be a very good case made out for the passing of an Act to give at all events a wider measure of justice than was afforded by the restricted Act of 1871. It was true that under the Public Works Act the Government was liable as carriers, but there were a great many other injuries which would arise out of the railway business besides those which were the result of the carelessness of the carriers. One great source of loss to railway companies in England arose from damages to persons injured by the negligence of railway servants. Was it not monstrous that, through the carelessness of railway guards, many persons' lives and limbs should be injured without any redress being afforded? There was the injury which the Hon. Mr. Hall had mentioned, arising from the setting fire to grass or crops, especially in the dry season. It would not take a very inventive mind to conceive a great many other instances in which a great practical wrong would be done to the subject without there being, as the law stood, any possible remedy. The only arguments that seemed to be brought against the Bill were of two classes. One was that they could not trust the young lawyers of the country. He did not think that was a very good argument. He thought the lawyers in this country were a very fair sample of the rest of the people—there were bad and good amongst them. At all events, if the actions were to be confined to the Supreme Court, there would be a jury which would at once see whether or not it was a trumped-up case, and probably the lawyer would take very little for his pains. Unless, indeed, we could imagine that the whole community was debauched in mind, and that the moral principle of juries was so blunted that they would conspire with speculative and depraved young lawyers, he could not see what practical injury would arise from that. Another argument used was also an attack upon the moral sense of right of the community. It was commonly said that juries were careless as to what extravagant awards they gave when the Government were the defendants. He did not know that juries were worse than Committees of another branch—and possibly this branch—of the Legislature in the matter of petitions. If they debarred the subject of his right to appeal to the Courts of law they would leave him only one tribunal, and that was the Parliament. He would have to approach Parliament by petition, and appear before the Petitions Committee. Well, Committees were very inscrutable, and their opinions were very diverse. Sometimes their awards were very liberal, and at other times they were marked by the most extraordinary parsimony. He believed that the average would be found to be rather over-liberal than over-parsimonious. He thought, moreover, that it was very undesirable that there should be the kind of influence brought to bear which this sort of thing had a tendency to introduce into the lobbies and into Parliament. If this Bill did nothing else than remove that evil, he would not regret the change. The honorable and learned gentleman who was their sole authority in the Council upon such matters, and who spoke from long practical experience, was entitled, he admitted, to very great respect and very great attention when he spoke so strongly as he did upon this subject, but he would submit to that honorable gentleman that, if he conceived there was nothing amiss in the New South Wales Act, and if he (Colonel Whitmore) was perfectly prepared to accept the principle of that Act, the honorable gentleman should give all the assistance he could in Committee, which he was sure he would do, because they all knew how willing he was to help them in matters of this kind in Committee. If the honorable gentleman would do that, he would not only be doing a personal kindness to him (Colonel Whitmore), but would be doing a very great service to the country. The honorable gentleman might depend upon it that he (Colonel Whitmore), the Hon. Mr. Hall, and many other honorable members, did not speak without some experience when they said that there were a very large number of instances arising every day in which the settlers of the country were treated, as the law stood, in a manner that might fairly be called tyrannical. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time, and he would be willing to amend it to the fullest extent in Committee.

THAMES ENDOWMENTS.

Mr. ROWE (on behalf of Mr. O'Rourke) asked the Minister for Lands, What steps have been taken, or are intended to be taken, to confer upon the unendowed Borough of the Thames endowments such as are proposed to be conferred on Kaiapoi, Lyttelton, and Akaroa under the 350th clause of "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1876"? The House would remember that during last session provision was made for setting aside endowments for boroughs throughout the colony. In January last the Thames Borough applied to the Government for an appropriation in this direction; but, so far as he was aware, no answer had up to the present time been received from the Government, and certainly no action had been taken in the matter. It could not be doubted that the Thames was as much entitled to such an endowment as many other parts of the colony. He had taken notice of what had been done in this respect during the present session. There was Akaroa, for instance, the representative of which district had done perfectly right in getting an endowment for his borough. The number of the inhabitants of that place was about 590. Then there was the late Minister of Justice, who represented Kaiapoi, which place contained about 1,000 inhabitants. The honorable gentleman got an endowment for that place, not only within the district, but outside of it, having selected some of the very best land in the province. He did not blame those honorable gentlemen, and would like to do exactly the same as they had done. But he happened to represent a borough which contained 10,000 inhabitants, and when that borough made an application for the endowment to which it was entitled no answer was given to the application. He trusted the Government would give a satisfactory answer. There was, perhaps, a difficulty in the way, and the Government might say, "You have no land in your district;" but there was plenty of land in Canterbury and Otago which the Thames people would have no objection to take. If there were no lands in the Thames District for the purpose, he trusted the Government would find them elsewhere.

Mr. MACANDREW said the Government were quite prepared to give effect to the petition of the Municipal Corporation of the Thames as soon as it was possible to do so. Certain lands had been pointed out which would be suitable for the purpose, but, unfortunately, that land at present belonged to the Natives. The Government had for some time past been endeavouring to get a title to that land, and, as soon as that was accomplished, effect would be given to the wish of the borough.

MARTIN'S BAY.

Mr. MANDERS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said a similar motion, having reference to Catlin's Bay, was moved by the Colonial Treasurer a few days previously, and carried. He was aware that many members of the House had visited Martin's Bay, and could testify to the fact that as good a harbour existed there as at Jackson's Bay. The first settlers were induced to take up land there by the Government, and other settlers had since voluntarily taken up their residence there independently of Government support. Altogether, Martin's Bay was becoming a very rising settlement. People were leaving the districts represented by the honorable members for Geraldine and Timaru, and many other parts of the Provincial District of Canterbury, and settling in this part of the West Coast. There was a fine harbour at Martin's Bay, and the expenditure of £1,000 would render it safe at all times. He hoped the House would pass the motion as it stood, and when the House went into Committee he would go into further details to prove that the expenditure of the amount asked for would be extremely beneficial. He knew that the Minister for Lands had the welfare of the district at heart, and he trusted the assistance asked for would be given.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on Wednesday, the 28th November, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider of an address to the Governor requesting that His Excellency will cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates a sum of £1,000 for the purpose of removing a rock that exists at the entrance of Martin's Bay Harbour, and for the improving of the approaches to that harbour generally."—(Mr. Manders.)

Mr. MACANDREW said the Government would have no objection to the present motion being carried, as it committed them to nothing. The honorable gentleman could explain the matter further in Committee, and honorable members would then be in a better position to make up their minds as to whether the proposal should be assented to or not.

Mr. REYNOLDS considered it mere waste of time to discuss the motion. The honorable gentleman's best course would be to induce the Government to send the "Stella" round to Martin's Bay when she made her usual lighthouse trip, and obtain information as to whether the proposal was practicable or not. The report would be laid on the table next session, and the House could take action upon it if it thought fit.

Mr. WOOLCOCK said he would not oppose the motion, but he would like to know what the population of Martin's Bay was at the present time. He visited Martin's Bay about twelve months ago, and the settlement was then in anything but a flourishing condition. He should like to know how many people were to be benefited by the expenditure of the £1,000.

Mr. REES thought that, after what had fallen from the honorable member for Port Chalmers and the honorable member for Grey Valley, it would be waste of time to proceed further with the matter. It would be better that the honorable gentleman should advance what reasons he had to advance in favour of the motion, so that the House might dispose of it at once.

Major ATKINSON suggested that the House should allow the motion to be passed. The honorable member for Wakatipu should interview the Government, and ascertain whether there was any probability of the work being carried out.

Mr. J. C. BROWN thought it would have been far better to have called this a river, and not a harbour. As honorable gentlemen knew, there were many harbours of refuge on the west coast of the Middle Island into which vessels of any size could run when they were in distress. Amongst others, there was Dusky Sound, which was frequently taken advantage of by vessels when the weather was rough. With regard to the river referred to in the motion, there was a "fresh" constantly running there, and it was very seldom that any boat could enter it. He did not think it wise to spend money in the way proposed.

Mr. SWANSON said that, if the Government would assure the honorable member for Wakatipu that when next one of their vessels went to this place the captain should be instructed to make a report regarding the rocks, such an assurance should settle the question at once.

Mr. MACANDREW might be allowed to say, in addition to what he had already stated, that the rock in question had been reported on repeatedly, and it was not unlikely that it could be removed for half the sum asked for by the honorable member for Wakatipu, or even less than half. The settlement was progressing slowly but surely, and would yet become a prosperous and important part of the colony; and in his opinion every obstacle to settlement should be removed. The Government would see what they could do in the matter.

Mr. BURNS thought the whole difficulty would be met if the Government would promise to send down the "Stella" at the earliest opportunity with some dynamite wherewith to blow the rock up.

Mr. MANDERS was quite prepared to accept the assurance of the Minister for Lands. He believed with the honorable gentleman that the rock could be removed for less than £1,000, but he had merely put that down as the very greatest sum that would be required.

Motion agreed to.

QUEENSTOWN AND CROMWELL RAILWAY.

Mr. MANDERS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that the honorable member for Invercargill had obtained a promise from the Government that the line referred to in the motion should be surveyed, and that the result of the survey would be made known to the Assembly next session. When they went into Committee he would be able to show that there were 200,000 acres of land in the district which he represented which were available for the purpose, and those lands could be appropriated just as well as certain lands had been appropriated for the Strath Taieri Railway. They would be as a mere fleabite taken out of his county, which contained 4,000,000 acres of land, of which about 60,000 were freehold. He would say no more at present, but would simply move the motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on Wednesday, the 28th November, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider of an address to be presented to His Excellency the Governor praying that he will cause land, in convenient blocks, comprising in the whole 200,000 acres, contiguous to the proposed line of railway from Queenstown to Cromwell, or situate in some part of Lake County, to be set apart for the purpose of constructing said line of railway."—(Mr. Manders)

Mr. MACANDREW thought it would be well if the honorable gentleman would not press his motion, as it was somewhat premature. The Government had already promised the honorable member for Invercargill that the line should be surveyed during the recess, and, as that survey would be made, he thought the honorable gentleman should withdraw his motion.

Mr. MOORHOUSE understood that there was some process by which the land could be reserved temporarily.

Mr. MACANDREW explained that the whole of the land in that district was held under pastoral leases, which would not expire for some years, and therefore it could not be sold.

Mr. MANDERS would accept the assurance of the Minister for Lands that the matter would be attended to, and therefore he would, with the leave of the House, withdraw his motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

DUNEDIN MUNICIPAL BILL.

Mr. J. C. BROWN, in the absence of Mr. Stout, moved, That this House will, on next sitting day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider of an address to His Excellency praying that he will cause the sum of £300 to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates to partially recoup the Dunedin City Council for expenses incurred in drafting the Municipal Bill of last year.

Mr. ROWE did not understand this motion. The House was asked to grant £300 for something, but no explanation had been given to the House by the honorable member for Tuapeka regarding the matter. If they passed this motion they might be called upon next week to give £500, and the following week £1,000, for a similar purpose. If they were to begin this sort of thing he did not see where they were to end, and therefore he would vote against the motion.

Mr. REYNOLDS thought he could explain the matter. Last year the Corporation of Dunedin introduced a Municipal Corporations Bill, at a cost of about £600, and, believing that the Act which was passed by the Assembly was based upon that Bill, they thought they were justified in asking the colony to pay a portion of the expense. The honorable member for Tuapeka might have stated that fact. Of course it was for the House to say whether the Council were entitled to anything or not.

Mr. KENNEDY would point out that there was some inconsistency about this matter, for, while the honorable member for Tuapeka was allowed to move a motion of this kind, his honorable colleague (Mr. Woolcock) was refused permission to do so a few days previously. He failed to see the propriety of passing a motion of this kind unless there was good reason to suppose that the House when in Committee would agree to have the amount asked for placed on the Supplementary Estimates. It could scarcely be contended that the colony was saved any expense by introduction of the Dunedin Municipal Bill of last year in this House. If that Municipality had been put to any cost in drafting a Bill which never became law, surely they had received all the advantages they required by the passing of the measure introduced by the Government and passed by this House. He thought it would be a waste of time to discuss and pass a motion of this kind, the sense of the House being clearly against it.

Mr. BARFF would point out to the honorable member for Grey Valley that he was wrong in attempting to draw a parallel between this case and that of his honorable colleague. The latter was a motion for setting apart 250,000 acres of land for the construction of certain works. He (Mr. Barff) had explained that the honorable gentleman who was deputed to bring the resolution before the House was also a member of the Committee to whom was referred the consideration of the construction of the work. It was utterly impossible for the merits of the case to be brought out in the House, and the Speaker ruled that the question could not be put. The two cases were not at all parallel.

Mr. LARNACH said they should not waste the time of the House in going into Committee on this matter. He would certainly oppose the motion. The Dunedin Corporation were not asked to incur the expense. They did so on their own responsibility, and this House should not be asked to refund the outlay.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the honorable member for Port Chalmers was not correct in saying that the Government had availed themselves of this particular Bill in framing their measure.

Mr. REYNOLDS said the idea was entertained that the Bill passed last session was founded upon the Bill of the Dunedin Municipal Corporation.

Mr. RICHARDSON said that was not correct. The Bill of the Government was in type long before they had seen the Dunedin Municipal Corporation Bill.

Mr. McLEAN could not support the motion, although he would be glad to see the City of Dunedin get this £300; but he was sure that, if the House had to pay for the drafting of Bills some clauses of which had been used in a general measure, they would have a pretty large sum to pay to Corporations. They might as well be asked to pay for the drafting of the Auckland Bill, of which they had heard so much. This application had been refused before, and he hoped it would be refused again, as he could see no claim which the Corporation had upon the House. That Corporation had derived as much advantage from the Act passed as they would have obtained from the passing of their own measure.

Mr. REES hoped the House would reject this motion altogether. He would certainly vote against it. The Corporation of Dunedin had drafted a Bill which was thrown out in this House, and they could not come to the House and ask for payment of the cost of drafting that Bill. If such a principle were once recognized, then public bodies which required Bills passed and were not successful might ask the House to pay the expense they had incurred. If the Bill had been carried the Corporation would not have asked the House to pay the expense of drafting it.

They had reaped the advantage they desired by a portion of the Bill having been put in the Government measure. He was glad to see the Colonial Treasurer taking a stand against such a claim, and he hoped the House would strenuously oppose any such new and utterly bad principle.

Mr. J. C. BROWN was sorry that the honorable gentleman in whose name the motion stood was not present, as he did not know anything of the merits of the case beyond what he had just heard in the House. He thought that it would be advisable to postpone the matter, and he would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Leave refused, and motion negatived.

GREY RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. WOOLCOCK, in moving the motion standing in his name, might state that the Grey was generally known as a very large and dangerous river, and, notwithstanding the fact that the river ran through a very broad and populous district, yet, up to the present time, it had not been bridged at any point save that where the railway crossed. The loss of life and the inconvenience to settlers in the Grey Valley through the want of this bridge had been something very considerable. The construction of this bridge had been in contemplation for the last ten years, and during that time various efforts had been made for its construction, but without any result. Unfortunately, the Grey River had been the boundary between the Provinces of Westland and Nelson, and one of the reasons why this river had not been bridged at the point referred to was the difficulty of the two Provincial Governments agreeing as to the amount each should contribute to the construction of this bridge. Notwithstanding that difficulty, efforts had been made on the part of those local bodies to get the work done, but between the Nelson Provincial Council and the Westland Provincial Council the whole affair had fallen to the ground. The Municipality of Greymouth and private individuals had had this matter under discussion on different occasions, but there had always been some difficulty in the way, as far as private enterprise was concerned. The cost of the construction had been found altogether beyond the means of the Corporation of Greymouth. The expenses connected with a new and rising municipality, and the inconvenience, loss, and expense arising from flood and fire, had been such a drain on the resources of that local body as to place the construction of the bridge entirely beyond their means. This bridge would connect the Borough of Greymouth with the Township of Cobden. It would give increased facilities for the Greymouth people in crossing over and residing on the Cobden side, and it would be a great boon to a large number of persons who were already settled on the Cobden side, Greymouth being their principal market; and it would further be a great boon to a large number of miners who were scattered throughout that district, and who experienced serious inconvenience through the danger of crossing this river. Another advantage arising out of the construction of this bridge would be this: It would be the means of increasing, to a very considerable extent, the amount of settlement in the Cobden District. They found from the returns published that there were at the present time on the Cobden side of the Grey River 232,000 acres of agricultural land. This land was in such close proximity to Greymouth that it would find a very convenient market, and, if these additional facilities were given for connecting this district with Greymouth, a great portion of this land would undoubtedly be taken up and settled, and thus a general benefit would be conferred. There was also, on that side of the river, a large area of coal country, and the construction of this bridge would be of considerable advantage to the district in that respect. The amount named might appear to be rather large, but when they looked at the importance of the district—when they considered the contributions of that district to the general wealth of the colony—he thought they would see that the amount asked for was really very small in comparison with the benefit accruing to the colony at large through the industries that were now being carried on there. The amount of imports there for 1876 was no less than £145,295, and the amount of exports was no less than £193,678. That gave an idea of the trade connected with this district. The contribution to the Customs revenue during the same period was £39,274. Therefore, when they took into account the importance of that district, the importance of its trade, the desirability of facilitating settlement in that district, and added to that fact the consideration that this bridge would very materially assist in that direction, he thought the House would come to the conclusion that he had fairly made out his case for the expenditure of this small sum of money.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this House will, on Wednesday next, resolve itself into Committee, to consider of a respectful address to His Excellency the Governor requesting him to cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates the sum of £10,000 for the purpose of bridging the Grey River between Greymouth and Cobden."—(Mr. Woolcock.)

Mr. SHRIMSKI thought the counties were subsidized to deal with matters like this, and he was greatly taken aback by such a proposal coming from one who had been such a strong supporter of Abolition. Certainly he should vote against the motion.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that petitions for works of this kind were constantly coming before the Public Petitions Committee, and the Committee always refused to recommend such claims to the favourable consideration of the Government. But, in addition to that, he did not think they were justified, in the present condition of the finances of the colony, in putting sums of £10,000, or even of £1,000, upon the Estimates for such purposes. If the House did not study economy, it would have to tax the people, who would have good reason to complain in that case. The House could not go on as it was now going on without levying additional taxation. They should not agree to such motions, unless the case was shown to be urgent, a vote absolutely necessary, and the work coming clearly within the duties of the colony.

Mr. Woolcock

Mr. LARNACH said the Government were quite sensible of the difficulties which existed in carrying out such works, owing to many of the counties having no funds with which to take up such works as these, and it became a serious question of policy as to what should be done. He could only say this: that, if the House went into Committee on the question, he should then have to ask for time to consider the whole matter during the recess. There could be no doubt as to the necessity which existed for bridging these rivers. The number of lives lost annually, presumably from want of bridges, was extraordinarily large. The Government was fully alive to this, and he would undertake to say that the whole matter should be considered during the recess.

Mr. SEYMOUR said he was glad to receive that assurance from the Colonial Treasurer, for it was very clear that the counties, except a few of the richer ones, could not grapple with these large works; he might even go further, and say that such works had been outside the possible finance of some of the smaller provinces. It was a crying disgrace to the colony that these rivers were not bridged. Many of the most dangerous rivers in the colony were now in just the same position as they were twenty years ago, and lives were endangered, property injured, and postal communication delayed in every part of the colony in consequence. He saw no possible way out of the difficulty except for the Government to include these bridges in their public works, and consider which of them were most necessary, and which were within our means, and then bring down to the House as soon as possible a schedule of the bridges necessary to be constructed for safe travelling, the carriage of the mails, and the establishment of communication in all parts of the country.

Mr. McLEAN would like to point out to the Colonial Treasurer that the House had been spending money on roads on the West Coast to compensate that part of the colony for not having railways made there as in other parts of the colony; and, though he did not know this spot, he thought bridges must be made on the West Coast if the roads were to be of any value. There could be no doubt that the counties would not be equal to such works as this unless they had larger borrowing powers conferred on them, and it must become the duty of the General Government: it was a matter that should receive serious consideration. He thought this matter might be allowed to go into Committee and be fairly considered there, especially as the Government had treated other districts so kindly.

Mr. LARNACH explained that, if there were any sums on the present Estimates, it was owing to the action of the late Government, who had framed the Estimates. The Estimates before the House were those of the late Government.

Mr. McLEAN said the late Government had not put the sums referred to on the Estimates. The present Government had taken up some memorandum of the late Government, and adopted them as Estimates.

Mr. LARNACH was understood to contradict the statement of the honorable member for Waikouaiti.

Mr. REID said that the Government had taken these items and made estimates of them by laying them on the table of the House and forwarding them with the recommendation of the Governor. It could easily have been ascertained from the officers of the department, and, if not from them, certainly from late Ministers, in what position these matters stood. The fact was that deputations were constantly coming in from the various districts, representing that such and such ought to be done, and members who so came as deputations were told that their applications would be considered. Notes were taken of the applications, and the whole were to be considered simultaneously, and answers given then. He knew several honorable members who thought that they were not answered speedily enough, and it was quite possible that that feeling had had a prejudicial effect upon their action towards the late Government. Because they did not get instantaneous and favourable replies from the late Government they said they could get no reply, but that the present Ministry gave answers immediately, and that business was conducted very smoothly. With regard to those items, they were only put down to be considered when all the applications had been received, so that they might be considered on their comparative merits. Not one of them had been fixed upon, and it was with very great surprise that the members of the late Government found those items in the schedule of the Estimates laid before the House. With still greater surprise they saw them treated in the Financial Statement as liabilities which had been left unprovided for by the late Government. They were not liabilities at all. The expenditure was not even decided upon. There were no promises given with regard to them, and he trusted that the honorable gentleman would not attempt to lead the House to a wrong conclusion in respect to those items.

Mr. BAIGENT thought that if bridges were to be built at all they should be placed over the rivers in the interior of the country, and not in such a position as it was proposed to place this bridge, which merely seemed to be for the convenience of residents on one side of the river going over to reside on the other. He did not know much about the Township of Cobden, and he did not know that it was a very important place. As compared with other localities in the interior, he could not see that there was any necessity for a bridge at all. He took it that the demand for this bridge showed the mistakes of which the engineers had been guilty. If the Brunner Railway had been taken on the other side of the river, on the firm ground, it would have saved three-quarters of the cost of the railway, and no bridge would have been wanted.

Mr. MURRAY understood that as soon as counties were established bridges were no more to be mentioned in the House except in terms of congratulation, but the fact was that the very scrambling which used to take place in the Provincial Councils was now found, but to an increased extent, in the House. All matters that used previously to be fought out in the Provincial Councils were now constantly troubling the House and turning it into a great log-rolling machine. The honorable member for the Taieri talked of the sums placed on the Supplementary Estimates left by the late Government as items for consideration by Ministers. Was the honorable gentleman aware that they were printed as Supplementary Estimates before the present Government came into office? It was therefore natural to suppose that the late Government were responsible for them. He held in his hand the original Supplementary Estimates, and he found on them very considerable amounts put down for bridges. He supposed, according to the explanation of the honorable member, these were to be held out as baits, and were not to be finally dealt with until the close of the session, when the direction given to votes would very much influence how the items were to be dealt with. The honorable gentleman said that some honorable members had gone against the late Government because they could not immediately get what they wanted. It would be edifying if the honorable gentleman would point out who those honorable members were. It was not the fact of honorable members not getting what they wanted which influenced votes, but the hope of what they might get. The honorable member for Waikouaiti said there were railways in other parts of the colony, but none on the West Coast. He would point out to the honorable member that there was a most important and expensive railway constructed there, the Brunner line, and that special grants out of loan were set apart for the construction of roads in that district; and, whereas the roads paid nothing in the shape of interest on the cost, the railways throughout the colony were, according to the late Government, to pay sufficient, not only to cover the interest on their cost, but even to relieve the country from all taxation. Then the honorable gentleman appeared to forget the sums which had been paid for water-races and other undertakings on the gold fields. So that, upon all grounds, the West Coast had been very fairly considered, and that point might be dismissed. There was, however, another point which should be considered—namely, that there were many other bridges throughout the country which ought to be constructed; and, if the colony had not money sufficient for the purpose, then either there must be increased taxation by the Central Government, or—and much better would it be—the people who wanted the bridge should be called upon to tax themselves for the purpose, and not come to demoralize the House by systematic log-rolling in order to get what they wanted. He should be glad if the Government would give this matter their full and careful consideration—if they would consider whether they could not, by means of advances on loan, assist local bodies to construct public works, or else, if they could not do that, consider the desirability of giving those local bodies larger borrowing powers, so that they could themselves undertake the construction of such works as bridges. It would be a waste of time to discuss the matter further, and the honorable gentleman ought to take the assurance of the

Mr. KENNEDY hoped the motion would be agreed to, notwithstanding the objections the honorable member for Bruce had advanced. The particular district for which this work was asked might be regarded in the light of an outlying district in respect to the Provinces of Westland and Nelson. The honorable member for Port Chalmers produced a statement to show that Nelson and Westland had received their fair share of expenditure out of loan; but, whether that were the case or not, it could be affirmed that this particular district had not received its fair share. The railway to which the honorable gentleman referred was not constructed on the same principle that all the other railways in the colony were constructed. It was constructed exclusively as a coal railway, and reserves were set apart for the purpose—namely, as security for the railway. No doubt the sum asked for was considerable, and the proposed bridge was not on what might be called one of the main road-lines of the district, and therefore the sum claimed for its construction could not be so strongly urged as if it were on one of those main lines. At the same time, if the Superintendents of those provinces had done as the Superintendents of other provinces had done, it would now have formed a provincial liability; because in the Nelson Provincial Council it was agreed that a sum of £5,000 should be voted for the purpose if the Westland Provincial Council would agree to put a similar sum on the Estimates. With regard to the unimportance of the Township of Cobden, he thought the honorable member for Waimea could scarcely have seen the district, or, if he had, it must have been at some unfavourable time. There was a considerable settlement, not in Cobden itself, but in the Coal Creek Valley—a district not inferior to the Waimea. To connect that district with Nelson was worthy of the attention of the Legislature, and the work was altogether beyond the efforts of the local authorities. The importance of it was recognized to such an extent that, if the local authorities gave protection over the bridge, it would be created at once; but it was altogether against public policy to grant monopolies and excessive charges on main thoroughfares. He trusted the Government would allow the motion to be passed; and when in Committee, if they found there was not sufficient money to erect a dray bridge as was asked for, they might see their way to allow a sufficient sum of money to be voted to erect a wire bridge. The Township of Greymouth, as was well known, was chiefly built on a Maori reserve, whereas that on the Cobden side was built on Government land; and, if means of communication between the two places were given, he believed a large settlement would soon take place at the latter township, and the settlers of the district would then be able to take their produce to Greymouth, which was the only market available to them.

Mr. RICHARDSON said that, if the geological reports which had been laid before the House were correct, it would be found that the chief reason for asking that this bridge should be built was that it would be of great assistance in developing the large quantity of coal that was known to exist in the district. If the question were allowed to be taken into Committee, the Government would, no doubt, before that stage was reached, give the subject their consideration, and the Minister for Public Works would be able to ascertain in his department what the cost of the bridge would be. As far as he was aware, it would be very costly. His object in rising was to refer to the Supplementary Estimates, with regard to which a most important statement had been made. It appeared from what was said that neither the late Government nor the present Government had considered these Estimates. That seemed to be a most remarkable oversight, and when the Estimates came on for consideration the House would have to bear that fact in mind. Perhaps, in the meantime, the Government would fortify themselves with information on all the items, and be able to enlighten the House upon them. With regard to the motion under discussion, it would be very hard that the honorable gentleman who brought it forward should be shut out, when the demands of others were admitted, simply because he came in rather late in the day.

Mr. J. C. BROWN thought the doctrine just laid down was very extraordinary. He understood that these Supplementary Estimates had been found in a printed form by the present Government when they took office. He understood that the rule was that, before Estimates were printed, they were considered. (No.) Then it ought to be the rule, so as to save the expense of printing. When he saw a copy of these Supplementary Estimates, he concluded that they had been passed by the late Government before being printed.

Mr. McLEAN might say, as a member of the late Government, that he had never seen these Estimates, and therefore they had not been passed by the Government. The rule was to have the Estimates printed before they were considered by the Cabinet.

Mr. DE LAUTOUR contended that it was of very little importance whether the late Government had finally assented to these Estimates or not, because the present Government had told the House that, in accepting the Estimates of the late Government, they intended to subject them to a strict revision. He therefore did not look upon it that the present Government were bound by the Estimates of their predecessors. It would perhaps be wise on the part of the West Coast members not to press for the amount asked for in this motion, because, in the Supplementary Estimates to which so much reference had been made, he found large sums put down for the West Coast. He did not say that the application now made was unreasonable, but, if the honorable gentleman succeeded in carrying his vote, it would amount to his losing a large proportion of the sums placed on these Estimates, which, it appeared, had not been assented to by any Government. With regard to what has fallen from the honorable member for Bruce, he did not think that that honorable gentleman was right in laying down a hard-and-fast rule that bridges such as that proposed in the motion should be constructed by local bodies. The residents in the interior districts had no title in the land, and it would not be fair to tax those people to construct works which would benefit land that was the property of the Crown. In fact, as the people had no title in the land, there would be nothing to tax. You could not tax the land, and to raise rates upon their homes would be most oppressive. The Government must recognize the principle that they must either abandon the lands of the interior and sell them as pastoral lands, or give reasonable means of communication to and through those lands, so as to make them available for settlement. When settlers were located on the land they could be taxed, but the struggling settler who was forcing his way into the interior ought not to be called upon to construct these large works. It ought to be the policy of the Government to encourage settlers to press on into the interior, rather than to turn round and say to them, "We will tax you at a rate which will enable us to open up communication to our lands." If that theory were worked out it could only result in failure; but it was satisfactory to know that the Government recognized that, and that they had promised to consider what steps should be taken for the construction of arterial works into the interior. The honorable member for Grey Valley would consult his own interests by not pressing the motion.

Mr. MURRAY said he had previously expressed the view that Crown lands should be taxed for such works.

Mr. MACANDREW said the honorable member for Wairau had made one remark which should not be allowed to go uncontradicted. He said that New Zealand had exhibited a most scandalous and culpable neglect in not bridging its rivers. His opinion was that the reverse was the fact. He believed there was no country in the world, with such a handful of people, comparatively speaking, which had in the same time done so much toward bridging its rivers. That was done under the provincial institutions, and he believed that, had those institutions been allowed to continue, much more work of the same character would have been accomplished.

Mr. STAFFORD said the statement of the honorable member for Dunedin City was scarcely correct. It might be very true that in Canterbury and Otago very great exertions had been made to bridge the rivers, but if they took New Zealand as a whole it would be found that in the great majority of cases the rivers had been left in the condition in which the people found them when they came to New Zealand. One or two bridges had been erected out of colonial funds since the Public Works policy was initiated; but very little in this direction had been done under the provincial system. Take the Province of Wellington, for instance. Where were the bridges erected by the Provincial Government of that Province? There was a bridge put up at the Hutt, which was washed away, and a bridge to replace it was not finished until the funds were voted by that House. A compact was entered into for the erection of the bridge at Wanganui, but that compact was never fulfilled, and it was again left to the House to vote the money for that bridge. Many other rivers between Wanganui and Wellington had not been bridged to this day. A bridge was now in course of construction over the Manawatu River, but that was not being done under the provincial system. Where were the rivers that were bridged in the Province of Auckland? Where were the rivers that were bridged in Hawke's Bay? He did not mean to say that no rivers had been bridged, but he would ask members to look at the large number of rivers in the Province of Auckland which were not bridged to this moment; and, as a matter of fact, there were, even in Otago, a large number of rivers which were not bridged under either the provincial or the general system. So that the honorable gentleman should not say that so much had been done, as applying to the whole of New Zealand. Those provinces which had a large land revenue had done a good deal, but they had not done so much as might have been done towards opening up the country. What was the meaning of the motion which the honorable member for Waikato had placed on the Order Paper? It simply meant that, in one of the most favoured parts of New Zealand, it was necessary at the present moment to vote more funds in order to open up the country. At the same time, he did not think the people of New Zealand were justly liable to reproach; in many cases they had done as much as could be expected of them; but the honorable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Macandrew) was always under the delusion that what applied to Otago applied to all New Zealand. The fact was that the North Island, from the absence of that land revenue which the Middle Island had enjoyed, had been unable to construct many bridges which, under a wise policy, would have been constructed long ago.

Mr. HODGKINSON would not make up his mind as to which way he would vote until the close of the discussion. He wished at that point to direct the attention of the honorable member for Timaru to the fact that he (Mr. Stafford), more than any other man in New Zealand, was responsible for the unsatisfactory condition of affairs at which they had arrived. This was the Parliament which had carried Abolition, and, according to the theory of the honorable member for Timaru, it was to be the grand, national, centralistic, dignified Parliament of New Zealand, consisting of superior men, who were to concentrate all their energy upon grand national subjects. But, instead of that, what did they see? A Legislature which was a bad cross between a Provincial Council and a big Board of Works. That was the result which the honorable member for Timaru had brought upon them; and, instead of coming into the House occasionally and sitting quietly in his seat, he ought to exercise all his energies, such as they were, in an endeavour to extricate the colony from the difficulty in which he had assisted to place it. It was well known that the late Premier was kept in office by the existence of a compact with the honorable member for Timaru that he should remain there until Abolition was carried. The former Premier, Sir Julius Vogel, made a boast on one occasion that when this grand national system was brought about they would "never hear anything of those small works; such as making roads and building bridges, except by way of congratulation." But this grand national system had produced quite a contrary effect. They heard from all quarters of the House that those local bodies were quite unable to carry out those works, and were therefore compelled to come to that House and beg of the Government to help them. That was a very unsatisfactory state of things, and it was just what he expected. Instead of this grand centralistic system doing away with one great evil—the system of log-rolling—it would increase it tenfold. In previous Parliaments there had been nothing like the amount of log-rolling they had seen this session. The Order Paper was crowded with applications for making roads and bridges. It began early in the session, when the honorable member for Waikato placed this notice of motion on the Paper: "That, in the opinion of this House, it being now established that the counties are unable to make provision for the construction and maintenance of the main arterial roads of the colony, it is imperative that immediate and permanent provision should be made by the Government for the gradual construction and maintenance of the same." The honorable member for the Taieri, who was then a Minister, said that there was no necessity to bring forward such a motion, as the counties had been created, and they would be able to undertake such works.

Mr. REID.—I said it had not been proved that they were not capable of undertaking them.

Mr. HODGKINSON said they might assume that it had been proved, because the following motion stood on the Order Paper in the name of the honorable member for the Taieri himself: "That this House will, on Wednesday next, resolve itself into Committee, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor requesting him to cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum for re-erecting the East Taieri Bridge, which is now unsafe for heavy traffic." He was quite entitled to infer from that that the county system had been a failure, and that the honorable gentleman was determined to take his part in the general scramble. He did not hold himself personally responsible in any sense for this result, because he always predicted that it would happen. He might also remark that the humble follower and shadow of the honorable member for the Taieri, Mr. Lumsden, had also a motion on the Paper to this effect: "That this House will, on Wednesday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider of an address to His Excellency the Governor praying that a sufficient sum may be placed on the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of the erection of a bridge on the Mataura River at Gore." He thought it probable that on the next Order Paper would appear a motion for the construction of a bridge over Aperima River, in the County of Wallace, because, if the Taieri County and the Southland County were to receive assistance in such a form, the County of Wallace, which required it far more, should also receive assistance. There was a vast amount of land in the County of Wallace which was not available, and, in proportion to its area, that county was not so wealthy as Southland. One bridge in that county would be absolutely necessary, when the Otago Railway was completed, to give the settlers on the other side of the river access to the railway. According to present intentions it was proposed to put the cost on Wallace County, and, if so, it would be very heavily taxed. Even the most sanguine Centralist must admit that this county system had been a failure. He said last session that the counties were an abortion, and could not be kept alive. What did they find now? These notices were proof and evidence of the truth of what he said. He did not mean to say that, amongst the sixty counties, there might not be a few which had exceptional advantages. There was, for instance, the County of Vincent, which possessed large mineral resources; but it owed a great deal to its chairman, the honorable member for Dunstan. He thought this was one of the most important questions before the House, inasmuch as it involved a very great principle. If they were to go on with motions of this kind they would be placing both the Ministry and the members in a false position, for every district would expect its members to get money for it. The result of this would be that the Ministry would be embarrassed by applications for money. In his opinion the provincial districts should have sufficient means to carry out local works without bringing those works before the Assembly, and so giving rise to a system of log-rolling. He thought that the county system was a failure, and in his opinion it had already demoralized the House, and was, in fact, a system of the very worst description. As the honorable member for Timaru was not now present, he would not refer to what that honorable gentleman had said.

Mr. SWANSON said that the honorable member for Timaru had asked where the bridges were that had been erected at the expense of the Provincial Council of Auckland. He (Mr. Swanson) would mention some of them. One of them was the Tamaki Swing Bridge, which was erected across an arm of the sea in such a way as not to interfere with the navigation. Within sixteen miles of Auckland there were nine bridges on one road which had been erected by the province, and some of them must have cost thousands of pounds: one over the Whau was as long as the wharf in Wellington. He held that the province had done all it could in the way of making bridges, and, when it could not make a bridge over a river, it stationed a ferryman there night and day to take people over. Therefore it was entirely incorrect to say that the province had not done all in its power to provide necessary bridges. He did not believe that there was any place in the colony which had done so much in the same space of time in this direction, taking into account the means at its disposal. Auckland had done its best, and that best was something very considerable.

Mr. ROWE had listened with very great pleasure to the remarks of the honorable gentleman who had just sat down. He must say that, notwithstanding the views he entertained with reference to Provincial Governments, he could not agree with, and, in fact, was astonished at, the remarks of the honorable member for Timaru. He agreed with the honorable member for Newton that the Province of Auckland had done all it could with the means at its disposal, and if the General Government did as well it would be very satisfactory. He held that the county system was a good and proper system for New Zealand, and, as a proof of that, he would say that, since the county had been formed in his own district, the people of the Thames had accomplished more with the small means at their disposal than the Provincial Government could have accomplished for many years to come. They had obtained the consent of the Natives to make roads which the Government had been trying to get for many years. Then, again, there was a large river at the Thames, in which many persons had been drowned during the last four years, owing to the want of a bridge. The General Government, with the assistance of their agents and officers, had been trying for a long time to get the Natives to allow them to put a bridge over the river, but they had tried in vain. Within the last year, however, the county had succeeded in obtaining the necessary consent from the Natives. He held that the county system was the proper system for New Zealand, and where it failed it was on account of the want of people who were willing to work it. If the county system was taken up by the people of New Zealand, and they entered into it heartily, they would find it much better adapted to their circumstances than the provincial system ever was.

Mr. REES was glad to hear the honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe) say that his district was so well satisfied with the county system that it did not want any assistance whatever—

Mr. ROWE explained that he had not said that.

Mr. REES might have been mistaken, but he certainly understood the honorable gentleman to say so. It was quite a new and original thing to say that, when the General Government could not get the consent of the Natives to erect a bridge over a river, the county could get it. He thought that the honorable gentleman deserved some mark of recognition from the people of his county, and from the Natives who had been persuaded to give their consent to the erection of the bridge, for originating the idea. He (Mr. Rees) thought that the observations of the honorable member for Waimea regarding the value and usefulness of the bridge referred to in the motion of the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Woolcock) were very just, and were well worth the consideration of the House. He believed that the river in question could always be crossed. One night, during one of the heaviest floods that had ever occurred in the district, he had crossed the river by means of the ferry; and he believed that any person could do so at any time by the same means. The strongest argument against the motion was that which had been used by the honorable member for Grey Valley (Mr. Kennedy), who said that a bridge would be built by private persons if they could obtain the right to levy tolls. He would like to know why, if private parties were willing to build the bridge, the colony was asked to do so. If the district could build the bridge it should do so. It was not for such cases as those that the public funds should be expended, and, much as he desired to see the interests of Greymouth consulted, he did not think that this was one of those cases that this House ought to take into its consideration at all. A very large amount of money had been expended during the last few years in carrying out harbour improvements in Greymouth. In the Public Works Statement of the late Government there was a sum of £15,000 put down for Hokitika Harbour improvements. That was an item which he thought ought to be expended. The Hokitika people had had very little public money spent in their district, while the people of Greymouth had had a very large amount indeed expended upon harbour improvements. He had expressed his opinion to two or three members of the late Ministry to the effect that the proposed Hokitika Harbour improvement would be a good and useful work. He thought that the public money should only be expended on works which were urgently necessary, and which were likely to result in much public good. For instance, money might be well expended on the works pointed out by the honorable member for Waimea, in a part of the country where a large amount of auriferous land would be opened up, where the rivers were very dangerous to cross, and where there were no ferries. A few thousands spent in opening up new avenues for trade, and in enabling the miners to work the land in that district, which they could not now work because of the high cost of provisions and of travelling, would be money well expended. In out-of-the-way places, where it was absolutely necessary that some means of traffic should be provided, it would be a public benefit to expend money in that manner. He was very much pleased to hear the remarks which had fallen from the honorable member for Newton in reference to some observations of the honorable member for Timaru. The latter honorable member had a reputation of many years' standing, built, as far as he (Mr. Rees) could understand, upon nothing—built upon sand. He was sorry the honorable gentleman was not present to hear any remarks he might have to make, but he supposed it did not matter very much, although he would have preferred to say what he had to say in the presence of the honorable gentleman. The honorable member seldom addressed the House without casting a stone at somebody or something, and especially at provincial institutions. The honorable gentleman had that day denied a statement made by the Minister for Lands, that provincial institutions had done a very great deal for the different provinces. He would not say that it came with very bad grace from the honorable gentleman to say this, but it was not true. Provincial institutions had done a great deal in road-making, the erection of buildings of a public nature, and the construction of bridges: in fact, nearly the whole of the evidences of civilization which existed in the colony at the present time in relation to these matters were owing to provincial institutions. The honorable member for Timaru had stated that these works had been carried on by the General Government with money spent from loans. He (Mr. Rees) would ask, how many bridges had been built by the General Government out of loans? How many railways had been constructed? The very object of the abolition of the provinces was said to be that roads and bridges should be constructed, not by this Assembly, but by local bodies; and now what did they see? Looking at the Supplementary Estimates prepared and printed by the late Government, he found no less than fifty-six items for the making of roads and bridges. The honorable member for the Taieri, the late Minister for Lands, stated that those Supplementary Estimates were not assented to by the late Government. Then why were they printed? What were they to infer from the printing of these Supplementary Estimates but that they had been duly considered, and were in a fit condition to be brought down to the House? The honorable gentlemen said, "Oh, no; they are only applications that have been made." The Government should not receive applications in a private manner. If any honorable gentleman would simply run his eye down the list of proposed works, it would be seen that nearly the whole of these works were to be carried out in districts represented by honorable gentlemen who supported the late Government. If they were not to be considered, why were they printed? Surely there must have been some prima facie understanding, at any rate. It was a matter of notoriety that some honorable gentlemen had boasted that they had obtained promises with respect to these works from the late Government. They had stated so to their constituents, and it was reported in the papers: they claimed credit from their constituents for obtaining those promises. It would be far better if applications for these works were put openly on the Order Paper, rather than that private applications should be made to the Ministry. What right had the Ministry to receive private applications? None at all. He did not think there could be a doubt as to the breaking down of the county system. The honorable member for the Thames (Mr. Rowe) very strenuously stood up for the counties; but he seemed now to want assistance for his county. If the county had been successful, why did it not do its own work?

Mr. ROWE.—It does its work.

Mr. REES hoped the Government would remember that, when any applications were made for assistance. He was sure there were many counties that had not sufficient money to do their work. In respect to the carrying out of useful works, the counties had been a lamentable failure. They could not make the necessary bridges or roads, or carry out necessary improvements. In Canterbury the counties were not brought into force, but the local bodies of that provincial district were overflowing with money that ought to be the money of the whole colony; they had tens of thousands to their credit at the bank. With the exception of the districts in Canterbury, there was not a locality in the colony that could do its work except the town districts. He had never asked anything for his own district, because it was not affected by recent changes; so that he was in a position to give a fair and impartial judgment in relation to other districts. It could never be said, in regard to anything he had said or done, that he attempted in the slightest degree to hinder the work of colonization, or cause the slightest obstacle to the opening up of the country for settlement, whether in Auckland or in any part of the colony, north or south. The honorable member for Timaru should have remembered that the only reason why some of the provincial works were not carried on as they might have been was that the honorable gentleman and his party had been despoiling the provinces of their funds. The money had been taken from them, and they could not reasonably expect them to do as much work as they would have done if the necessary "sinews of war" had been at their disposal. He believed the provinces, with the exception of Otago and Canterbury, had suffered through the system of government which had been carried on for years past, and through the encroachments on their powers by this House, led by men who did not know what they were doing, or who, if they did, had misled this House. Those men now turned round and reproached the provinces because they could not do the work, when they had taken from them the means by which alone they could have accomplished it. He should vote against the motion being considered at all. He had no doubt it was a work that ought to be accomplished; but, if there was any possibility whatever of private funds being expended in the erection of this bridge, it was not a work which the Government should undertake at all.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is scarcely a bridge of any importance at which tolls are not collected.

Mr. REES.—There were many rivers which would not be bridged if they had to depend on the tolls received. Where men of enterprise could profitably take up an undertaking of this sort, the Government ought not to be called upon to expend public money. There were numberless places, including those mentioned by the honorable member for Waimea, where public money ought to be expended, and where private means could not possibly be obtained for the purpose of carrying out the works required. The present proposal was only for the convenience of the inhabitants on two sides of a river, and who were already provided with very fair accommodation. Greymouth had not had such scant justice done to it as other parts of the colony. Seeing that they would have to borrow the money to carry out the public works which appeared on the Supplementary Estimates, he did not consider that this was one of the cases that ought to be considered by the House, at the present time at all events. He therefore trusted that the House would not agree to the motion.

Mr. WOOLCOCK hoped that the House would not object to go into Committee, when, if the Minister for Public Works could not see his way clear to put a sum on the Supplementary Estimates, he would be content that the work should be classed among others to be considered by the Government during the recess. He felt quite satisfied that, if the matter were looked into, the claims of the district for this work would be undeniable.

Motion agreed to.

COUNTY AND MUNICIPAL ENDOWMENTS.

The interrupted debate was resumed on the question, "(1.) That each county in New Zealand should have a permanent inalienable endowment of Crown lands, in proportion to the area of such county, and the endowment, where possible, to be within the county; (2.) That each municipality in New Zealand should have a permanent inalienable endowment of public lands, in proportion to population, and the endowment, where available, to be within the municipality;" and the amendments proposed: In the first resolution to omit the words "in proportion to the area of such county;" and at the end of the second resolution to add the words, "and that no grants under 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1876,' of land outside municipal boundaries be made before the close of next session, in order that a further opportunity may be afforded for considering the endowment of municipalities on some uniform system."

Mr. BURNS said, when the arrival of the hour of half-past five had interrupted his speech on a previous occasion, he was calling attention to the discrepancy between the two parts of the resolution. One proposed to regulate the endowment in proportion to the area, and the other in proportion to population. He thought it should be regulated by population in each case. That seemed to be the object of the honorable member for Akaroa, and it was well worth consideration. He might add that he would very much like to know from the Government what they intended to do with those municipalities. He was very anxious to know whether they were going to pay the subsidies this year, or whether they intended to stop the subsidies altogether. If they would answer that question, it would throw light upon the matter, and he must say that at the present time he felt a little anxiety upon the point.

Sir G. GREY thought the honorable member was out of order and wasting time by talking in that way, when the Financial Statement gave all information on the point.

Mr. BURNS had now got all that he wanted. If the Government was going to carry out the Estimates of the late Government in this respect he was quite satisfied. But it was a strange thing that a great number of those bodies had subsidies due to them which were not paid; and they were naturally getting anxious about the matter.

Mr. LARNACH explained that that had arisen from the fact that the accounts had not been sent in.

Mr. BURNS understood that there were some old subsidies which had been standing over for a long time, which ought to have been and which would have been paid in October by the late Government, but which had not yet been paid. If the honorable gentleman would look into these matters he would find that a great deal of hardship was being inflicted upon local bodies, and he hoped that the honorable gentleman would look into the subject as soon as possible. Those bodies—he was not going to say whether properly or improperly—went on spending their money in full confidence that the subsidies would be paid, and when they were not paid on the due date a great deal of confusion and hardship arose. In conclusion, he need only say that he hoped the House would not throw any obstacle in the way of those bodies which had been promised endowments. They had applied for their endowments, and had been promised them according to law. Everything had been done fairly and above-board, and he trusted that the House would not go back from the engagements which they had legally entered into with those bodies.

Mr. MURRAY said he could not agree to the amendment of the honorable member for Akaroa, or to the theories advanced by the honorable member for Roslyn, because the counties of large area would have more roads to maintain, and very likely would possess land of an inferior quality of soil, which would not bear so high a rate-charge as that of the smaller counties. Besides, the endowment-land to be made would be of the average quality of land throughout such county, and, if of a fixed amount, would be much less in value than the endowments given in more favoured and highly-peopled districts in the colony.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—It says nothing about the average quality of land.

Mr. MURRAY had not thought fit to encumber his resolution by going into details. All those matters could be settled by the Bill. It would be most unfair that wealthy and peopled districts which had already got roads made, and did not require so many public works or such large endowments, should receive very valuable grants, while other and poorer districts received very little. He thought it would be very unfair to fix the area according to population. He believed, however, that the honorable member for Akaroa was inclined to withdraw his amendment, and that some words additional to the motion would be moved which would make the motion acceptable to both sides of the House; and he hoped that the motion as amended would be agreed to, and the principle he sought to establish affirmed.

Mr. WOOLCOCK looked upon this as one of those little paper constitutions which the honorable member for Bruce was so fond of bringing before the House. He agreed with the honorable gentleman that it would be inconvenient to go into details, because if they did they would at once see that the motion was thoroughly impracticable. It would require a readjustment of the endowments annually as the circumstances of the various bodies or districts required. The honorable gentleman himself evidently had sufficient knowledge of the subject to enable him to discover that his proposal was impracticable, and that it would not be advisable to press for details. It did not matter whether the motion was carried or not—it was of so impracticable a nature that it would never come into operation.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said, the honorable member for Bruce having explained that he did not mean what he had expressed, he should ask for leave to withdraw his amendment.

Leave given, and amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GISBORNE moved the excision of the words "where possible" from the resolution. According to the present system, part of the proceeds of the land sold went to the county within which it was situated; therefore it would be unfair to endow one county at the expense of another. Possibly that provision might not be taken advantage of, but still it would be as well to excise those words.

Mr. SUTTON said that, in the present state of the law, there were no such things as county endowments. The Land Fund did not go to the county, except in so far as the counties were a part of a provincial district. The Land Fund was allotted to the provincial district, and it was then subdivided to the counties in that district. This question was a very large and important one, and should be carefully considered, which could not be the case at this late period of the session, and in the present state of the House. He would therefore vote against both the amendment and the original motion. Honorable members were aware that the Government intended to make the Land Fund colonial revenue, and, if that was to be the case, this resolution would have no effect whatever.

Mr. MONTGOMERY would like to see the words "where possible" struck out; and he would also move, To omit the word "county," for the purpose of inserting the words "provincial district." That, he gathered, was the meaning of the honorable member for Totara.

Mr. MURRAY-AYNSLEY thought the endowments should be given to counties, but that they should be within the boundaries of those counties, as most of them were very large and had plenty of land. It was a very different thing with regard to municipalities, for a great number of the old municipalities had no land which could possibly be turned into an endowment for their benefit. The town he represented had an undertaking from the provincial authorities that an endowment should be made for its benefit out of lands within the provincial district. It was absolutely necessary that the borough should have that endowment in order that it might carry on at all. Even if the authorities levied the full rates that they could charge, they would not be able to do all the work unless assisted by endowments. If he had had anything to say to the setting aside of endowments for Lyttelton, he would certainly have made them much larger than they were; but, as they were arranged between the municipal authorities and the representative of the Provincial Government of the day, the borough got much less than it ought to have got. There was great expense incurred in keeping the streets in repair, and there was a large amount of Government property within the borough which was unrateable, so that the borough must ask the House either to vote year by year the proportion that the Government property would give to the rates, or to give an endowment which could be fixed now as agreed upon. He hoped the House would not pass the second amendment, but would allow the endowments already fixed to be carried out; and then, next year, the Government could bring down a measure dealing with the future endowments of municipalities. He considered that when a township was proclaimed the Government should make certain reserves within the boundaries as municipal endowments, and should also put in their Bill a provision that private parties cutting up land as a township should be forced to put by a certain percentage of the sections as an endowment for that township, because, although those persons got high prices for the land, they left the people who took up the sections without any assistance, and caused them to apply to the House for help, when there ought to be sufficient endowments within the township itself to render them independent.

Mr. SWANSON hoped the House would keep the words "where possible" in the motion. He failed to see why the County of Eden, a section of which he represented, was to get nothing because there were no Government lands in it, while Government land was to be served out to other parts of the country because there happened to be areas of unsold land there. He had not himself troubled the House by asking for roads and bridges, but in a matter of this sort he contended that all should start fair. If there were to be endowments for some counties they should be given to all. It must be admitted by every one that the public works which had to be carried out in the County of Eden were as extensive, as expensive, and as difficult to make and keep in repair as those in any part of the colony, and yet all had to be done at the expense of the people of the county, without any assistance, except the subsidy which the House gave in addition to the rates, which subsidy, he was satisfied, would soon cease. The honorable member who moved in this matter could not have considered that, while there were some counties of enormous size—as big as Taranaki, for instance, in which there were still large areas of unsold Crown land—there were others in which there was no land left out of which to set apart endowments. He hoped the words "where possible" would be left in the motion; and let the Government of the day treat all alike.

Mr. MURRAY explained that his reason for putting in the words "where possible" was that in many counties there were not sufficient areas of unsold Crown lands to form endowments. Where the Government thought it desirable to set apart endowments they should first of all grant them within the boundary of the county itself, and, when there was not sufficient land within the county, they should take land as near as possible outside the county boundary. His object would not be defeated by the amendment of the honorable member for Akaroa, and he would therefore not oppose it. Of course, when the Bill was before the House which would give effect to these resolutions, honorable members could discuss all the minutiae, which need not be done now, and then it could be kept in view that endowments should be in or near the county interested. With regard to what had fallen from the honorable member for Lyttelton as to the necessity for insisting on endowments being set apart in townships laid out by private individuals, he might point out that that course had already been adopted in one instance, at all events. He was informed that the Hon. H. R. Russell, a member of the other House, had laid out the Township of Waipukurau in sections which were leased for ninety-nine years, at the end of which time they would become the property of the municipality. That was a wise provision, and showed a liberality and good sense which it might be well for the Government and other proprietors to imitate.

Mr. Gisborne's amendment, "That the words 'where possible' be struck out," agreed to.

Mr. Montgomery's amendment, "That 'provincial district' be substituted for 'county,'" agreed to.

On the question, That the amendment to the second resolution be agreed to,

Mr. REID said he was disposed to vote against the motion altogether, because the law already provided for granting municipal endowments. He thought it would be unwise to fix the endowments according to population. It would be far better to deal with applications for municipal endowments as they arose. There were many municipalities with small populations at the present time which in fifty years might be of far more importance than municipalities which now had large populations. The endowments should rather be made in accordance with what might be supposed to be their ultimate importance; and, carrying out that view, it would be better to endow existing municipalities from time to time, as their necessities demanded. The system of granting endowments in proportion to population would operate very unfairly in many cases. For instance, municipalities required assistance in their early days in order to enable them to form streets and to carry out sanitary arrangements. Then, as the population became more dense, they might grant endowments up to a reasonable limit, and finally leave the inhabitants themselves to raise what further funds they might require. The hands of the Government should not be tied. They should be left to take into consideration the wants of particular districts as necessity arose, subject to a maximum limit. The question arose with the late Government whether there should be a smaller grant in some cases, and they decided to grant the maximum in every case, because, no matter how good the reason for refusing to go beyond a certain limit, it might be said that they did not do so because the member who requested it did not happen to be a supporter of the Government. He quite agreed with the first resolution. The day was fast approaching when the counties would not get subsidies from revenue, and, that being so, there was no reason why they should not be placed in a position, by means of endowments, to provide for their own requirements. He hoped the time was not far distant when subsidies to counties would be discontinued. It was a mistaken policy to raise revenue from Customs duties in order to dole it back in the shape of subsidies, which induced the inhabitants to tax themselves lest they should lose their share of the Customs revenue. If the principle he advocated were acted upon, the Colonial Treasurer would, in future, be able to shape his finances on a more satisfactory basis.

Mr. SWANSON said he cared very little what became of the motion, but he wished to touch upon a remark made by the honorable member for the Taieri. In Auckland sixpence extra was tacked on to the rates in order to get the subsidies. Instead of taxing themselves less they had made the taxes more, and that accounted for the rates of the Borough of Auckland being so high for the last year or two. He quite agreed that it was wrong to raise money from Customs for the sake of handing it back again in the way of subsidies. It would be far better to leave it in the pockets of the people, for money collected in that way lost largely before it got back again. There was one other matter to which he wished to draw the attention of the Government. There were a great number of new towns being laid out—several were being laid out near Wellington just now—which were nothing but curses. They were laid out by private people, who had not the slightest regard to the formation of streets or the convenience of the public. No reserves were made in them for public purposes; no endowments to relieve the rates, or for education. People bought sections in these towns without ever seeing them. That had been done in Auckland over and over again. Thousands of pounds had been made by land-jobbers, who laid out towns without any regard to public requirements. If the Government laid out a town they made all proper arrangements; sites were reserved for schools, post offices, and police stations, in view of the possibility of a large population being settled in the town; but it appeared to be nobody's business to see that proper arrangements were made when a private town was laid off. He contended that it was the bounden duty of the Government to attend to these matters, and to see that proper provision was made to meet the wants and see to the health of the people. They should see that the streets in private towns were of the proper width, with open spaces for recreation, and that a proper system of drainage was provided, and, above all, that a proper title was given, for there were cases where people had discovered that, after being in possession of their sections for some years, there was a mortgage over the land, they lost the money they paid and the houses they had built, the money received from the section-holders being put into other speculations instead of going to pay off the mortgage. He hoped the Government would give this subject consideration. Mr. O'Neill introduced into the last Parliament a Bill to regulate the plans of towns, but it applied solely to Government towns. It was the duty of the Government to see that private towns were properly laid out, and he hoped they would not neglect it. He saw from the newspapers that grievances connected with private streets were constantly cropping up in Wellington; but, apart from all other views of the matter, the Government should see that these streets were of a proper width. In a narrow lane, if it became necessary to lay a drain, or if there was a dray unloading, all traffic had to be stopped in consequence; and, if a fire broke out, nothing could be done, for want of room. He would conclude with an appeal to the Government to look closely into this subject in the future.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. GIBBS, in order that the resolution should not be an empty record, moved the following addition: "and that any measure giving effect to the generalization of the land revenue should include provision to give effect to the foregoing resolution."

Mr. REID thought it would be better to adopt the first resolution as it stood, and then allow the matter to stand over.

Sir G. GREY hoped the resolution would not be agreed to.

The hour of half-past five o'clock having arrived, the ACTING-SPEAKER left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

NORTH OF AUCKLAND WORKS.

On the motion of Sir R. DOUGLAS, it was ordered, That an address be presented to His Excellency, praying that he will cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates the following sums for the works set opposite to them, respectively: Road from Maungaturoto to Waikakei, £1,000; for opening road at Ruatangata, £300; wharf at Whangarei Heads, £200; road at Maungakarama, £800; tramway at Kamo, £2,000; Mangapai Wharf, say, £800: total, £5,500.

The motion was consequently agreed to, and progress was reported.

Mr. REID moved, That leave be given to sit again on Wednesday next.

Mr. MURRAY moved, That the word "next" be struck out, with a view to the insertion of the word "month." At this stage of the session there was no time to consider impracticable measures. A great deal of rubbish had been talked on the subject, by the honorable member for Timaru, amongst others, as to the cost of planting. However, he should not take up the time of the House in discussing the matter further.

AORERE TRAMWAY.

On the Order of the day being called, That the House go into Committee of the Whole, to consider of an address to be presented to His Excellency the Governor, praying that land, in convenient blocks, comprising in the whole 20,000 acres, be set apart, in the Aorere Valley, for the purpose of constructing a tramway to open up the land in that valley for settlement by connecting it with the shipping port of Collingwood; and that he will be pleased to cause surveys to be made and specifications to be prepared during the recess,

Mr. REES moved, That the Order be postponed for one week.

Mr. GIBBS trusted the House would not postpone the going into Committee on this question, and that no particular feeling on the part of any honorable members would induce them to prevent the subject being discussed. The object was one which, he was sure, would commend itself to the House fully as much as any resolution of a similar character that had come before it this session. If the resolution were passed, he had no intention of asking the House to consider a Bill to carry it into effect. He merely wished the House to affirm the principle and ask the Government to have this piece of country surveyed. He was confident that, if the Government carried out the latter part of the resolution, and had this valley surveyed, they would be convinced that what he had previously stated was quite true—namely, that a road would open up for settlement a very large extent of country. A further extent of country would be opened up, which at present was quite unapproachable, for pastoral purposes—an extent of country which very few persons in New Zealand knew anything about. He did not himself know the land minutely, but he knew it sufficiently to say that there was a large area of country which would be available for pastoral purposes after a road had been made through this valley. There was now no possible approach to the country he referred to. He trusted the House would pass the resolution, asking the Government to have the survey of the valley made.

Mr. HODGKINSON should be sorry to oppose any motion of this kind, but all these cases ought to be dealt with fairly. A few days ago, when he had brought forward a more urgent resolution, having reference to important coal fields in the colony—a motion which had stronger claims to consideration—he was obliged to withdraw it. He thought the honorable gentleman should be satisfied with eliciting the views of the Government on the subject. If this resolution were dealt with as his (Mr. Hodgkinson's) resolution had been dealt with, he would have no objection.

Mr. BAIGENT supported the resolution. If the proposed road were made through this valley, it would open up a fine extent of country, and thousands of acres of land would be rendered available. It was known that coal, gold, silver, and marble existed in that part of the district. The House had already agreed to set apart certain blocks of land in Otago for a similar purpose, and he thought honorable members ought at least to adopt this resolution.

Mr. MACANDREW looked favourably upon the proposition made in this resolution, and hoped the House would not object to consider it.

Question put, "That the Order of the day be postponed till this day week;" upon which a division was called for, with the following result:—

The motion was consequently negatived.

Mr. GIBBS said that, in order to save the time of the House, as the Minister for Lands had given an assurance that he looked favourably on the proposal, he would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Captain RUSSELL did not think that the honorable gentleman ought to be allowed to withdraw the motion, because the Government were taking up a position which they ought not to be permitted to assume, considering the policy with regard to the land which they had lately introduced. Until the House knew more about the land policy of the Government it should not affirm such a principle as that which was now enunciated—namely, that of giving away land for the purpose of constructing district railways. He must object to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. MACANDREW thought that, after the division which had just taken place, the Government would be perfectly warranted in getting a report upon this proposed work; and, when that report was laid before the House, the whole question could be discussed. The proposition was not to carry out the work now, but merely to get the necessary data on which to submit a proposal to the House.

Mr. GIBBS said that, as there was an objection to his withdrawing the resolution, it had better go through the ordinary course.

Resolution considered in Committee, and agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. THOMSON moved, That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to cause to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates the sum of £2,000, for the purpose of extending the telegraph to Catlin's River.

Mr. BURNS would like that the line should be extended to the Nuggets Lighthouse, and would move the addition of the following words: "and to the Nuggets Lighthouse."

Mr. THOMSON would accept the amendment.

Mr. FISHER said this was an important national undertaking, and he thought the line might well be extended as proposed by the honorable member for Roslyn.

Mr. McLEAN did not see why places should be treated in a different manner. When the Government was asked to extend the telegraph line to the Kaipara, the people there were required to give a guarantee of £350 that the line would pay, and he thought that a guarantee ought to be given in this case also, especially when it was understood that both cases should be treated alike. He would move the addition of the words, "provided the usual guarantee was given."

Mr. GIBBS would like to know in how many cases such a guarantee had been given. If it were expedient that the telegraph should be made, he thought it should be made in the interests of the public generally, and without any guarantee being required. It was not only the people of that particular locality who would benefit by the extension of the telegraph, but it was the country at large. He did not think guarantees were necessary in cases of this kind.

Mr. STOUT would like to know whether the honorable gentleman had ever heard of a light-house-keeper being asked to give a guarantee to the Government that the telegraph when extended to the lighthouse would pay.

Sir R. DOUGLAS did not believe in requiring guarantees, and, if a guarantee were required in this case, he hoped that a guarantee would also be required for the Northern Wairoa line.

Mr. HUNTER thought a guarantee ought to be given. It was the common practice to require a guarantee, and no exception should be made in this case.

Mr. STOUT said if the line were extended to the Nuggets Lighthouse it would be taken miles out of its way. He knew the object of the honorable member for Roslyn in wishing to have the line taken by way of the Nuggets. The honorable member thought that some saw-millers at Catlin's River were going to get an advantage. If the Government were to be compelled to cause the settlers of Catlin's River to give a guarantee that this line would pay, he did not know what they would be required to do next.

Mr. McLEAN said they all knew that the extension of the line to the lighthouse would not pay. The telegraph at Catlin's River would be principally used by the saw-millers.

Mr. STOUT would like to know whether the settlers at Owaka Flat would not avail themselves of the telegraph.

Mr. McLEAN did not know whether they would or not. If he had remained in office he intended, when this matter came up, to add the words to the motion which he had already stated. If the House did not require a guarantee from the settlers at Catlin's River, he thought the guarantee which had been required from the Kaipara should be removed. As the telegraph was extended for the benefit of the people of the whole colony, those lines which paid well should be made to pay for those which did not pay. It was necessary in the interests of the colony that the telegraph should go from one end of New Zealand to the other, whether these lines paid or not.

Mr. MACANDREW wished to know whether the honorable gentleman when he was Commissioner of Telegraphs required a guarantee from the Dunstan and Queenstown people, or from the people residing in a great many other places to which the telegraph had been extended. It was unfair to single out the settlers at Catlin's River, and to require a guarantee from them. He could mention scores of places, of less consequence than Catlin's River, from which no guarantee whatever had been required.

Mr. BURNS hoped that as soon as the line was erected the Minister for Telegraphs would advertise the fact. If the line were extended as proposed it would be a great boon to sailors and shipping men generally. In the interests of those poor fellows who had to struggle through the waves, and whose lives were frequently imperilled, he hoped due notice would be given of the completion of the line.

Mr. McLEAN said it might easily be perceived that he was not in favour of taking these guarantees, but he wished all places to be treated in the same way.

Mr. GIBBS said that, as sailors had been referred to by the honorable member for Roslyn, he could state to the House that he had known of vessels that had been knocking about the Straits for two or three weeks before anchoring at Totaranui, and the captains of which, in his opinion, would be glad to pay double or even treble rates if they had the opportunity of communicating with the owners or consignees.

Mr. ORMOND understood that it had been the practice of the Government hitherto, when the telegraph was extended to any district, to call upon the people of that district, in the event of the line not paying, to give a guarantee. He understood that the honorable member for Wai-kouaiti had only suggested the guarantee because the people in this locality were very few, and were not likely to support the line.
